A QUEER COMBINATION.

What a queer combination of cheek and perversity,
Insolence, pride, gab, impudence, vanity,
Jealousy, hate, scorn, baseness, insanity,
Honor, truth, wisdom, virtue, urbanity,
Is that whimsical biped called man!

Who can fathom the depths of his innate depravity?
Today he's all gayety, tomorrow all gravity.
For blowing his own horn he has a propensity,
Even under clouds of singular density.
Oh, mythical clay bank called man!

A LITTLE BLUE CAP.

I was paying a visit to my friends, the Durands. They were a simple, honest couple, who lived near the banks of the river, in a tiny house, a mere bird's nest, almost hidden by wistaria and Virginia creeper. Durand's hands bore the marks of honest toil, for he had been a locksmith in his youth, and had by industry and economy raised himself steadily until he became the proprietor of a large business and secured a competency for his old age. His wife, a quiet, gentle creature, worshiped her husband, and both of them wore on their faces an expression of serenity which betokened ease of conscience and a life of peace. Durand was past sixty years of age and his wife must have been fifty, yet in spite of their wrinkles and gray hairs these two treated each other with an affectionate deference which was a pleasure to behold. They were Philemon and Baucis resuscitated.

While we were engaged in conversation just before dinner Durand rose and opened a drawer to take out some trifle which he wished to show me. While he was turning over the contents of the drawer it chanced that a little cap, such as might have been worn by a doll or an infant, fell to the floor. I picked it up and noticed that it was made of coarse blue linen, with two bits of twine instead of ribbons. As I handed it to him I said gayly:

"Are you preparing a baby basket, Papa Durand?"

I had no sooner spoken than I regretted it, for I recollected at that moment having heard that the only shadow on my friends' lives was the fact of their union being a childless one. For a moment Durand made no reply, but looked at the little cap affectionately; then, as he laid it carefully away again, he said in a tone of seriousness:

"That is a souvenir."

Then we all three sat down to dinner and talked of other matters, but as soon as the repast was finished and the little maid of all work had put cigars and liquors upon the table my friend said suddenly:

"How much that baby cap reminds me of!" It was evident that he wanted to explain his remark, and I begged him to do so.

It was a great many years ago, he said after a slight pause, for I was about twelve years old. I was working in a large factory, and I had a companion of the same age as myself whom on account of his ugly features we nicknamed Zizi Monkeyface.

He was a sly, thieving, mischievous urchin, very much given to filching tarts from the pastry cook's counter, but a jolly little chap and full of pluck. He was so lazy that he would have been turned out of the factory had it not been for the indulgence of the overseer, who had been a friend of his father, and who took an interest in the boy for the sake of his dead comrade. Monkeyface was an orphan, and the only relative he had ever known was the woman who brought him up, a cousin of his mother. This woman was a fish peddler, a brawling, brutal creature, whose affection for her young charge was manifested only by blows. Perhaps if he had known a parent's love he would have been less perverse.

One afternoon the lad took it into his head to run away from the factory and go vagabonding about with a gang of young ruffians like himself. As they were coming slowly home after nightfall they heard, to their astonishment, the cry of an infant. The sound seemed to issue from a long, narrow, dirty alley which opened on the street, and at the other end of which hung a dimly flickering lamp. After a short consultation the street boys ventured softly into the passage and one of them espied behind the door a little bundle of rags which struggled and wailed. He seized hold of it, and the whole party ran into the street triumphant, stopping under a lamp to examine their capture. It proved to be a baby girl a few weeks old wrapped up in a series of dirty cloths—a poor little innocent whom a wretched, perhaps desperate mother had abandoned to the charity of strangers.

A council was held to decide what should be done with the booty, and the young captors gave free play to their mischievous imaginations. One said to put the baby back where they found it; another, to hide it in a half empty prune box which stood at a grocer's door; a third proposed to climb up to a second story balcony and leave the youngster there, and how astonished the people would be next day! But Zizi Monkeyface scouted all these ideas and declared that the baby must be given to the gypsies. There was a band of these people near by, who practiced jugglery and fortune telling, and instances of kidnaping were by no means rare.

Monkeyface's decision was hailed with enthusiasm, and he claimed the right to carry the treasure-trove in consideration of his having made the plan.

"Give us the kid," he said. The baby had all this time been screaming piteously, but it stopped suddenly when Monkeyface took hold of it, and while he walked along with an air of triumph it fixed its great blue eyes upon his ugly face and smiled, at the same time stretching its tiny hands out as if to caress him.

"She is laughing!" cried the boy in delight; "see how she looks at me."

Then a new impulse seized him.

"I will not give her away," he said; "I will keep her myself."

His companions protested indignantly, but in vain, for as they well knew Zizi Monkeyface had at the end of each arm an argument so strong that it would be useless as well as unsafe to oppose his wishes.

When he reached home with his burden the fish peddler exclaimed furiously:

"Do you think I have not enough to do to fill your mouth, you lazy imp? Take that brat to the police—quick, now!" Pif, paf! A box on each ear showed the boy that she was in earnest and he fled from the house.

That night he did not return, and the next morning he was in the factory as soon as it opened for the first time in his life.

"Mr. George," he said timidly to the overseer, "how much will you pay me if I work hard all day?"

"I have already told you twenty cents," answered the man in surprise, and Monkeyface worked indefatigably until night. The overseer, amazed and delighted at the change, paid the boy for his work and even gave him twenty cents in advance in order to encourage him.

That night Monkeyface was again absent from his home, and his cousin, the fish peddler, went to the factory the next evening, lay in wait for him and dragged him home in spite of his struggles, administering a thrashing on the way. But it was no use. As soon as the old woman turned her back to cook the soup for dinner the boy slipped out of the house and did not return.

The factory overseer, having been informed of the state of affairs, made up his mind to settle the matter at once by finding out where Monkeyface spent his nights, and for this purpose watched the lad as he left the factory. Mr. George, in company with one of the workmen, followed the wanderer a short distance and observed him enter a bakery and buy a small loaf of bread; next he went into a dairy and came out carrying a bottle of milk, and then turned his steps toward a lonely, deserted quarter near the river.

Suddenly his followers saw him plunge into a muddy alley. The place having no lamps was as dark as an oven, but Monkeyface was dimly visible as he stopped before a board fence. The next minute he had scaled it with the agility of the animal that was his namesake and was lost to sight.

The two men, determined to discover his hiding place, climbed over the wall and found themselves in a large vacant lot, surrounded by weeds and rubbish, but of Monkeyface there was not a sign.

At last they espied in the farthest corner a low wooden shed, which had evidently once served as a fowl house, and through the cracks of which a faint light was shining. They approached it noiselessly and peered through a crack. Great was their astonishment. In the middle of the wretched hut, in which a man would not have been able to stand upright, sat the young runaway, a candle end stuck in the ground beside him; he was gravely pouring milk into a feeding bottle, and in a corner on a bed of dried leaves a baby was sleeping soundly, wrapped up in an old blanket.

Zizi Monkeyface transformed into a nurse!

"What the deuce are you doing here?" asked the overseer, throwing open the door of the cabin suddenly, and the boy, startled at first by the intrusion, soon recovered himself and answered slowly:

"Haven't I got a right to have a little sister?"

Then after a pause he added grandly: "I earn twenty cents a day. That is enough for us both, and we don't ask any one for anything!"

The narrator paused, smiled softly and added:

"The next day the owner of the factory, being informed of the matter, raised my pay to forty cents—just double."

"What!" I cried, "it was you?"

"Ah, I have betrayed myself," said Durand; "Yes, I was the young rascal who was in a fair way to come to the gallows, and, thanks to the blue eyes of that little girl, I became a good workman and afterward set up for myself. Now you understand why I keep that little blue cap: she had it on when we found her."

"And what has become of her?" I asked eagerly.

The old man answered, "We have never parted;" then smiling, he looked at his wife and added, "have we, my dear?"

She smiled in return, but her eyes were moist as she looked at him, and under her eyelids I saw a teardrop glistening.—Translated for Epoch.

Fertilizers for Lawns.

The very common practice of covering city lawns with barnyard manure is disagreeable alike to the occupants of the home as well as passers by. C. M. Hooker thinks that it is very queer, after taking so much time and labor to make a good green lawn eight months of the year, the contents of the barnyard should be dumped upon it to remain there the rest of the twelvemonth. He affirms that if the owners who do this should practice instead dressing their lawns with unbleached ashes and nitrate of soda it would keep fertility and offend no one.

Microscopic Wonders.

The microscope has revealed many wonders, among others that the common caterpillar has 4,000 muscles in his body; that the drone bee's eyes each contain 1,300 mirrors, and that the large, prominent eyes of the brilliant dragon flies are each furnished with 28,000 polished lenses.—New York Journal.

COLLEGE WOMEN.

They are Rapidly Going to the Front in all Practical Affairs.

WHAT THEY HAVE ACCOMPLISHED.

Original Lines Along Which the College Bred Girl Works.—A Model Wife and Mother.

In the tremendous momentum of the movement for woman's advancement in place and power it is the hand of the college bred woman that controls the lever. It is not in her value as a leader, but in her virtue as a moderator that her greatness lies.

The importance of the college woman's influence in this question is not in the matter of superior scholarship, even though Phillippa Fawcett has written her name above that of the senior wrangler of England's great university. Of great value is it to the woman's cause that she has taken off her corset and built her gymnasium, and comes out of college a stronger woman than when she went in, with a better chance for the future in what she has learned of hygiene rather than of Greek.

Statistics show that while the proportion of marriages among graduates not only compares favorably with that among other women, and is constantly increasing, divorce is a thing unknown. It is not that her degrees equal those of men in importance, but that a greater proportion of the children of the educated women survive infancy than do those of other mothers lacking the college training which has been popularly believed to unfit women for motherhood. It is that she is bringing to bear upon the smallest details of the practical interests of life the discipline and enlightenment of scientific thought, thus refuting at every turn the time honored traditions that college life and business training unfit women for the greater responsibilities of wifehood and motherhood.

COLLEGE SETTLEMENTS.

Over in Rivington street has been demonstrated most successfully the college woman's idea of practical philanthropy, which is not of the almsgiving or fancy fair fashionable kind. The philanthropists of the college settlement invite the little children in to swing in the big swings and play in the sand heaps of their yard. They ask the tired women over for a cup of tea in a nice, neighborly way in the afternoon. They coax the boys and girls into their bright parlor in the evenings and give them games to play and books to read. They have clubs for sewing and cooking and dressmaking, lessons in hygiene, history and science.

Six or seven college women are in residence at the settlement, all busy workers in their various callings and devoting their leisure time to brightening the dreary lives in Rivington street. Chicago has a similar settlement called Hull House, where college men and women teach in the classes and enter into the entertainments provided for the people. The graduates of the Order of Kings' Daughters take private pupils free of charge and assist them in the university extension work.

Leaving the field of philanthropy for that of industrial pursuits, most unique among them is the Kingwood farm enterprise, under the management of Frances Fisher Wood. Confronted with the problem of feeding a delicate child, instead of consulting the old woman oracles and experimenting with patent foods this college woman studied the matter of infant food thoroughly from the best medical books written on the subject. As the result of her scientific experiments has been established the Kingwood farm, which is the wonder and admiration of the Granite State.

In the large, perfectly ventilated buildings are stalled this famous Kingwood herd, each one with a pedigree as long as an English earl's. Canvas cushions are provided in the roomy stable for the sleek beauties to kneel on when they want to rest. So clean and sweet are the big barns that a woman can sit with her needlework in their passageways. And the old farmers are never tired of telling how the milk will keep for years after it is once sterilized and sealed in bottles.

OTHER NEW LINES OF WORK.

A new departure of college women is in the raising of fruits, large and small, and in flower culture. One of New York's successful teachers has invested the capital accumulated by teaching in a flower farm in the south of France. A professional woman writes from southern California: "I have a small tract of six acres of orchard and garden, where I have filled in all my spare time for the past sixteen years most agreeably and profitably. I am satisfied that women can earn a comfortable living with a few acres of land, and the cultivation of the mind and development of body which an intelligent person can derive from such vocation will be a double compensation."

Lucy P. Salmon, of Vassar college, is collecting statistics on the great problem of domestic service, in the hope that some way out of the difficulty may be found. She urges that domestic labor, while having features peculiar to itself, is amenable to the laws which control other forms of industry, and that in the laws which underlie it a trained mind is essential. And she argues wisely that the great question for women to study is how homes may be retained without the friction and waste of material and nerve force that attends housekeeping at the present time.

Prejudice against the college training of women is breaking down, and though fathers are still more inclined to educate their sons than their daughters, a man of broad culture said recently: "If I haven't enough money to educate both my sons and daughters, I shall send the girls to college, because they need it more than the boys. Not that they are less bright than their brothers, for I think intellectually they are more clever, but because the world demands greater skill and better preparation in a girl than in a boy.

"The girl is more sharply criticised, meets with greater obstacles and is treated with less confidence in her ability than a boy, consequently she needs the best start. Besides, physically she is at a disadvantage and needs the discipline of the college training to enable her to work with less expenditure of nervous force than the untrained woman knows how to work."—New York Sun.

"There are only two creatures, says the eastern proverb, "that can surmount the pyramids—the eagle and the snail. Hence perseverance can sometimes equal genius in its results."

London's area is larger than New York, Paris and Berlin put together, an area which may be represented by a circle 30 miles in diameter.

Didn't Get It After All.

"Can you loan me a match, my good man?" inquired an elderly man of a Broadway driver on the down town trip yesterday morning at about 10 o'clock. The old gentleman had taken out from a well filled case a splendid twenty-five cent cigar, and the driver noted that there were others in the oxidized silver pocket case.

"Why, certainly—cheerfully, sir, I assure you," returned the politically polite man of the reins. And he fished around with one hand for a match, presently handing the old man several of them. More thanks. Profuse politeness on the driver's part, who sniffs the aroma of the cigar with evident delight. "I don't get much chance to smoke—at the dinner hour I smoke a cigar occasionally, for lots of gentlemen, as you have done, get a light of me and then insist upon giving me a cigar."

But the smoker was obtuse. "Of course," the obliger resumed, "I never expect anything of the kind, but they will insist upon it."

"Uh!" from the preoccupied smoker.

"It's odd, don't you think, that for every light I ever gave a passenger on this platform I got a cigar in return?"

"Quite odd."

"I finally learned to always carry matches, and I get several good smokes every day."

The old man was looking at the Diana weather vane.

"So far, today, I haven't gotten my lunch time cigar. Of course, all sentiment aside, I rather expect these returns of favors."

More silence.

"In fact, it's a business matter—it's politeness for revenue only, one might say. When a man wants a light real bad—as for a mere illustration, you yourself did just now—it ought to be worth a good cigar for him, don't you think?"

"Doubtless."

"Well now, my dear sir, you will pardon me for being plain, but have you a good cigar about you?"

"Yes; I have several good ones in my pocket. What's that got to do with all this talk of yours?"

And the remainder of the ride down busy Broadway was in silence—icy, icy silence.—New York World.

Power of an Old Song.

A street band, consisting of a harp, a flute and two violins, made such unusually good music on West street the other evening that a great crowd was beguiled into stopping and listening to it. The musicians seemed careful to suit all tastes. After every three or four tunes the chief musician canvassed the crowd, hat in hand. On one of these rounds he was stopped by a tall young fellow who stood in the shadow of a store doorway. The young man threw a coin into his hat and whispered a few words to him, and the musician, after a moment's thought, nodded his head and went back to his orchestra. He gave a short order in Italian, there was a tuning of the harp and the violins, and the next moment, clearly and expressively, came the strains of "Only to See Her Face."

There seems to be some touch of nature in the music of the sentimental old song that touches the average man and brings a pleasant lump into his throat, and it had its effect on the crowd. Some of those who stood near the tall young fellow in the doorway looked at him and smiled, half humorously, half sympathetically.

"Mashed," said a young woman in a red jacket.

"I have been there," said a man on the curbstone.

But the young fellow did not hear them.

He stood smiling also, half wistfully, and his eyes, ranging over the heads of the mucicians and the crowd, seemed fixed on some vague spot in the distance.—Boston Herald.

The Inventor of Panoramas.

Robert Barker, an Irish painter, who lived in Edinburgh toward the close of the last century, was the inventor of panoramas. In 1785 he was imprisoned for debt in the Scottish capital. His cell was lighted by an air hole in one of the corners, which left the lower part of the room in such darkness that he could not read the letters sent to him. He found, however, that when he placed them against the part of the wall lighted by the air hole the words became very distinct. The effect was most striking, and it occurred to him that if a picture were placed in a similar position it would have a wonderful effect.

Accordingly, on his liberation, he made a series of experiments which enabled him to improve his invention, and on June 19, 1787, he obtained a patent in London which establishes his claim to be the inventor of the panorama. London artists spoke with great contempt of Barker's exhibition, but their opinions did not prevent the public from rushing in crowds to see the pictures exhibited in the rotunda in Leicester square. Excellence was soon obtained in the art, and it became a "chestnut" that so completely descriptive was a panorama by Barker of a shipwreck that a Newfoundland dog would leap into the picture to drag the drowning persons out of the sea.—London Tit-Bits.

A Candid Woman.

This is a tale told by Mr. Sydney Gedge, M. P., who is good looking enough to afford to tell it. He was contesting a constituency against Mr. Cyril Flower, and in the course of his personal canvass he visited a house where only the good wife was at home. After a little conversation she promised him all her influence. "I am glad to know," said he gallantly, "that the ladies will support me. I was afraid that my opponent would have them all, because, you know, he is the handsomest man in the house of commons." The poor woman, unconscious of offense, gazed expressively full in the candidate's face and answered, "Ah, sir, but I'm not one of them as takes any notice of good looks!"—Illustrated London News.

Peacemakers.

"A baby," said a sentimental person in a public assembly, "is a messenger of peace in the household." A rough looking man at the back of the room was seen to be nodding his head repeatedly in answer to the sentiment.

"You find it so, do you not, my friend?" said the speaker.

"That I do," answered the rough man. "I'll tell you just how it is. When we was first married my wife used sometimes to fetch me a blow, and often I had to give her a whipping."

"And now it's all changed?"

"Yes; the young one catches all the blows!"—Youth's Companion.

How the Compass Points.

Don't say that the compass points to the true north, for it doesn't except in certain places. The compass points to the magnetic north, which is at present considerably west of the north pole. When Lieutenant Greely was at Lady Franklin bay the declination of his needle was found to be very great, the needle pointing toward the magnetic pole in a direction nearly southwest.—Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine.

IN A MAELSTROM.

A Visit to the Most Terrible Whirlpool in the World.

WONDERFUL NATURAL CURIOSITY.

A Seething Whirling Current Off the Coast of Norway That Roars Like a Thousand Niagaras.

If you take a map and turn to the western coast of Norway, in the 68th deg. of latitude, you will find traced thereon the name of the largest and most terrible whirlpool in the known world. This maelstrom is about a mile and a half in diameter, and its vortex has an inclination of 45 degs., or about that of water in a large funnel when half run out. Its condition is variant. Sometimes it is not at all dangerous; at other times it is so powerfully destructive that the largest vessel ever constructed, if once fairly caught in its whirl, could be no more than a mere feather. Everything that enters it at such a time is crushed and torn to pieces.

The cause of this immense whirlpool has been variously stated, but it is only guesswork and theory after all. Some have thought there is a subterranean passage, and that the waters come out at a great distance—one writer even giving the Gulf of Bothnia for their terminus. Others again, and with more plausibility, argue that the whirl is solely the effect of the waters of the tide, during its ebb and flow, being pent up by ledges of rocks, over which they fall with the velocity of a cataract, and assume the gyratory movement in their effort to escape or reach a level. The word "maelstrom" means "mill-stream," and is said to have been given to it because its rush resembles that of a mill-stream when it is let loose from confinement.

Business of a commercial nature led me to visit some of the ports of Norway and the Loffoden islands, and being within easy reach of the wonder of the world, I became possessed with a great desire to see it for myself. In conversation with an old Norwegian fisherman I learned, to my great surprise, that he had not only sailed close around it when it was raging with great fury, but that he had more than once ventured across it, with a strong breeze, during its regular lull at the turn of the tide.

A TERRIBLE SCENE.

The next day saw me walking the deck of a snug, well rigged schooner, on my way to a sublime scene of peril that for many a long year had often come up in my fancy with a strange kind of fascination. I need not describe my voyage down to the maelstrom, for that is of no moment in this connection.

From the moment I first heard the distant roar of the maelstrom we sailed directly toward it for more than an hour, the roar gradually increasing in volume as we neared it, until it became so loud that it was with difficulty that I could distinguish the different and sometimes rapid orders of the daring fisherman.

I can never describe the awful maelstrom as I saw it and felt it.

Imagine an area of a million and a half miles in diameter. To do this fully and comprehensively you should fix your eye or your mind upon some object a mile and a half from where you are. Then fancy this broad space to be all water, moving round in a circle, slowly on the outer edge, but gradually increasing in velocity toward the center, with a downward inclination of 45 degs., so that it looks like a vast hollow gulf of awful depth.

Then imagine yourself sailing round on the outer edge of this immense funnel, with the water black and level on one side of you and on the other inclined and running around and downward, rolling, tumbling, rushing, dashing, seething, whirling and boiling, the center lashed into milk-white foam and sending up the deafening roar of a thousand Niagaras.

If to all this you add the fancy that you are floating around this awful gulf in a frail vessel that seems only an air bubble, to be sucked in and crushed, and which, while driving before the wind, is now and then caught by a current and turned several points toward destruction, so that the master shouts frantically and the sailors make almost superhuman exertions to keep her from rushing madly into the vortex, and you pray agonizingly, with breath suspended and hair standing on end, till the wavering balance has inclined to life—if, I say, you add this to all the rest, you get perhaps as good an external of the scene and situation of the beholder as my descriptive powers are able to convey.

FATE OF A VICTIM.

Amid the bewilderment of this indescribable scene, my eyes dazzled with the whirling, rushing, flashing of the waters, my ears stunned with their hissing, dashing, thundering roar, my soul going down into the foaming vortex, and thence onward into the eternity beyond, the old fisherman laid one hand upon my arm, pointing with the other and shouted:

"Look! Behold!"

I turned and saw one of the seamen holding a large sea bird, to one of whose legs was attached a long cord, the other end of which was secured to a short, heavy stick of timber, which another sailor was in the act of casting into the sea. As the timber struck the water the one holding the bird let him go, and with a wild scream he flew to the length of his tether and then struggled in the air to break his bonds and escape. But the cord held him, and the moving timber took a gradual inclination toward the vortex.

With the schooner run safely back from the gyratory draft, I watched the bird with a glass, as the descending timber dragged him downward, fluttering and screaming, and seeming to my excited fancy like some unfortunate spirit being dragged to perdition. Round and round went the timber, slowly at first, and with steadily increasing velocity, till at last, with quick jerkings and rapid descent, the fluttering bird disappeared from my view.

I had seen enough—I had felt the emotions of a lifetime compressed into a few hours—and we sailed away from the never-to-be-forgotten scene.—New York Ledger.

Fat People and Disease.

Medical authorities declare that fat people are less able to resist the attacks of disease or the shock of injuries and operations than the moderately thin. Their respiratory muscles cannot so easily act; their heart is often handicapped by the deposit on it, and the least exertion throws them into a perspiration. A very fat person is in the position of a man carrying a heavy burden and too warmly clothed.—Yankee Blade.

Coinage of Money.

The first coining of money is attributed to Pheidon, king of Argos, in 895 B. C. Coined money was first used in England twenty-five years before the Christian era, but gold was not coined till the Eleventh century, and money was not given the round form to which we are accustomed until the lapse of another hundred years or so.—Notes and Queries.

Ancient Girdles.

Ancient girdles were in some respects like the chatelaines not long ago so much the rage among the ladies, but they differed therefrom in being more useful, more comprehensive in regard both to sex and to articles worn, and when completely furnished more costly. It is partly for this last reason that we find girdles bequeathed as precious heirlooms and as valuable presents to keep the giver's memory green after death. They were not infrequently of great intrinsic value. One of King John's girdles was wrought with gold and adorned with gems, and that of the widow of Sir Thomas Hungerford, bequeathed in 1504 to the mother church of Worcester, was of green color harnessed with silver and richly jeweled.

Not a few wealthy commoners were able to afford the luxury of gold embellished belts and were not superior to that pardonable vanity so long as no regulation prohibited them. Those who have studied our social history will not be surprised to learn that enactments were passed restraining them. Edward III forbade any person under the degree of a knight from wearing girdles, gilt or silver, unless he should happen to be an esquire of substance valued at more than £200, when a reasonable embellishment was tolerated. Henry IV confirmed this regulation, but it does not seem to have been stringently enforced, for Edward IV was constrained to impose a penalty of 40 pence upon the wives of servants and laborers who should have the pertinence to aspire to be as good as their masters' spouses.—Chambers' Journal.

Making the Most of Household Pets.

Whatever beast is kept it should have its own quarters in which it is at home and free from intrusion and to which it can retire when it chooses. This home should be kept clean and sweet by frequent changes of bedding and the use of soap and water. No one has a right to keep an animal in confinement who finds it too much trouble to attend to its health and comfort. It should be regularly fed on food that is most healthful for it, and what is quite as essential to its happiness and consequently to its health, it should be talked to and noticed as much as anybody.

I am certain many animals and birds suffer and die in our homes from pure loneliness and from being regarded by their human neighbors as creatures of an altogether different nature. Whereas the truth is, if one will but cultivate their acquaintance, he will be astonished to see how the dullest and most stupid will wake out of its apparent torpor and show understanding and character.

I know a family very fond of pets, in which the creatures show most extraordinary individuality. Their cats do things no cat was ever before known to do; their parrots and other birds show what we call human nature in a wonderful degree, and their dogs almost talk. The reason is plain; the animal or bird is made one of the family. It is talked to and petted as well as cared for. Its intelligence develops, and the beast becomes very like the human being.—Olive Thorne Miller in Harper's Bazar.

Effect of Paris Life on American Students.

An American artist of considerable reputation, while speaking the other day with reference to the easy going Bohemian habits so common among men in his profession, said: "It is not a pleasant thing to say, but I believe it is true that a period of two or three years of student life in Paris practically ruins about as many young artists as it benefits. Student life in Europe, and especially in Paris, is full of allurements and temptations which only those capable of great self control are able to resist. It is in its social aspects a delightfully free and easy sort of life, which appeals almost irresistibly to the average young man. It develops the habit of indolence with frightful rapidity, and from indolence it is but a short step to indifference, dissipation and reckless self neglect. Convivial associations and the gay company of a colony made of kindred spirits as bright and magnetic as himself too often put his ambitions to sleep, and he drifts on and on until he becomes a spendthrift and a lounger, if nothing worse. At the end of two or three years he returns to America, his money spent, his health frequently shattered and himself so thoroughly bohemianized that he finds it difficult if not impossible ever to regain anything of the orderly, methodical habit of industry upon which his professional success depends."—New York Herald.

Mr. Labouchere's Fish Story.

If Mr. Henry Labouchere has a habit of getting into trouble, he has also a happy knack of getting out of it. For instance, the other day, after he had printed an important piece of news about the proper way to cook crawfish and a humane reader of Truth expostulated with him about his advice to the cook to cut the live fish in halves, he retorted merrily by expressing the opinion that it is ridiculous sentiment to treat creatures of low or rudimentary organizations as if they had the same susceptibility to pain as a human being, and settled the question finally by telling an anecdote about an angling friend of his who once "caught a perch foul."

The hook pierced the fish's eye. My friend felt that he had not caught the perch according to the rules of the game, so, to compensate him for losing his eye, he put him back into the water. He then baited his hook with the eye and went to work again. Within three minutes he caught that same perch again with his own eye.

This is a capital fish story. We have not heard a better tale in a long while. It is a lie of course, but all fish stories are, and it has the merits of originality and humor. We like Mr. Labouchere the better for such harmless fibs.—New York Times.

Explaining It.

"Look here," said the indignant man to the dealer, "I thought you said this dog was a rabbit dog?"

"Did I? Oh, yes—of course. Maybe you didn't handle him right."

"What do you mean?"

"You want to try him with Welsh rabbits. His appetite for them is simply abnormal."—Washington Star.

A MODERN SAMSON

Marvelous Feats of Strength Performed by a Young Canadian.

A MATCH FOR THREE ORDINARY MEN

Lifting a Loaded Cart That Weighed Over a Ton.—How he Thrashed a Crowd of Roughs.

Louis Cyr, who is a British subject, was born in St. John's, Quebec, in 1863.

His grandfather on the maternal side weighed over twenty-three stone, while his mother's weight is only a trifle under nineteen stone. She is immensely strong, and only a few years ago was able to pick up a barrel of flour and carry it up two flights of steps. So far as his mother's side goes, therefore, he comes from a pretty sturdy stock.

His father's family were not quite so colossal, although fairly big men and women. His father, however, brings down the scale at sixteen stone.

It was only natural Master Cyr when at school was master of all the lads. At the age of fourteen there were very few men who could cope with him, and at that early age his muscular development was extraordinary.

His parents were living at Montreal when he left school, and the question was what should they make of this young Hercules? Well, ultimately it was decided that he should enter the police service.

He was about seventeen at the time, and his strength had increased in a marvelous manner. He soon showed what a valuable acquisition he was to the force. He was sent to do duty in the roughest and most disturbed district of Montreal. He made so many captures and quelled such a number of disturbances that he soon received substantial recognition from the authorities. He was paid double salary and used to do the work of three.

Naturally he was not very popular among the roughs. So they made up their minds to settle him. Accordingly six or seven picked men waited upon him one dark night and went for him with sticks and belts. He was frightfully cut and can show you the scars of the wounds he received about the forehead now.

It must have been a desperate fight, but in the end his pluck and superior strength were too much for the cowards. Three out of the six made their escape more or less hurt. One of the others he had picked up and dashed upon the ground, rendering him senseless. The other two he nipped around the waist until they screamed in agony.

A BIG POLICEMAN.

He was just making off with the two he had captured, when he compassionately thought of the poor injured fellow on the ground. He, therefore, changed over his prisoners to the left hand, and holding them both firmly with one hand by the collars, picked up the senseless man with his right arm and threw him over his shoulder.

It must have been a curious sight to see this marvelous man with his senseless burden and captives going down the streets of Montreal on that dark night, the blood from the wounds in his forehead running down and nigh blinding him. He dropped the wounded man in at the hospital as he passed, and took his prisoners to the station. Cyr, however, was very much cut and had himself to go to the hospital. This and many other episodes during his service with the police made him very popular, and after the event described he was left unmolested.

He had been a custodian of the police for nearly two years, when an incident happened which called attention to his immensity of strength.

One day he was on duty in one of the chief thoroughfares, when a cart laden with bricks came to grief. The horse fell down and the shafts were broken. They succeeded in getting the horse free from the harness. But what was to be done with the cart? There it stood right in the line of traffic. It was suggested that it should be unloaded.

"Stand on one side," said the muscular young policeman. Divesting himself of his coat and handing his hat to somebody standing by, he crouched under the cart, pressing up with his great broad shoulders. The bricks, cart and all were lifted foot by foot until they were moved right on to the sidewalk.

The applause of the crowd collected was tremendous. Some gentlemen who had witnessed this performance were so astonished that they had the whole lot weighed. The weight that he had lifted was found to be a little over 2,100 pounds.

That feat of strength determined his career.

PLAYING WITH AN ANCHOR.

He left the police and at once entered into the show business. By steady practice with the dumbbells and proper training his muscular powers gradually increased to the enormous dimensions of today.

The toughest customer he ever had to deal with in lifting to the shoulder was a Captain Burst. On one occasion when in New Brunswick Burst offered to bet him $200 that he would not lift the same weight on to his shoulder that the captain would.

"Done," said Cyr, and the money was put up.

This feat was not to take place at an exhibition, but on board one of the ships laying off where they were.

Now, Burst was what you might call a "whopper." He stood 6 feet 7 inches, and, unlike the generality of giants, he was a broad shouldered, muscular individual.

So to the ship they repaired, with the stakeholder, referee and a few acquaintances.

Aboard the vessel was an anchor weighing exactly 800 pounds. Burst picked up this pretty little toy and placed it with apparently not much difficulty onto his shoulder. It remained there for about a minute, during which time the wonderment and applause was great. The anchor was then taken from his shoulder by six men and replaced upon the deck.

Then came Cyr's turn, and the betting was two to one against him. He had never attempted such a feat before. Yet, nothing daunted, he grasped the anchor and after a desperate struggle managed to get it onto his shoulder. It was a near thing, however, and nothing like so easily done as by his opponent. Never mind, he got it there.

"Now," said Cyr to the captain, "just you get up and straddle across my shoulders."

After some persuasion he was induced to do this, and Cyr, to the blank astonishment of the crowd, especially his opponent, walked around the deck. This so astonished Burst that he shook him by the hand and said, "Well, now, you're the first man I've ever given best on that feat." And the $200 was paid to Cyr.—Liverpool Letter.

It is strange, though true, that in Asia and Africa, where grass will not grow, the most beautiful flowers and shrubs flourish to perfection.

Ordinance No. 50.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every male person over twenty one and under fifty five years of age, found in each Road District of the County of Inyo, State of California, between the first day of March, 1894, and the thirty first day of December, 1894, excepting all persons who were honorably discharged from service in the army or navy of the United States, at any time between the first day of April, in the year A. D. 1861, and the first day of September, A. D. 1865, and who have not paid the same in some other road district, must pay to the said County of Inyo, a road poll tax of two dollars.

SECTION 2. Said road poll tax shall be collected by the Assessor of the said County of Inyo, in the same manner that State Poll Taxes are collected, and shall be paid to the Treasurer of the said County of Inyo and shall be placed to the credit of the several road districts of the said County of Inyo from which said road poll tax was collected.

SECTION 3. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and Ordinance No. 46 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 9th day of January, 1893, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances and parts of Ordinances of said Board in conflict here with are hereby repealed.

SECTION 4. This Ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said County of Inyo, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

Round trip tickets from Independence to the Mid-winter Fair, including four admissions, $25 60.

The sum of $491.25 has been raised by private subscription for the Mid-Winter Fair up to date.

Mrs. F. Rhine left for San Francisco on last Saturday's train, where she expects to remain about a month.

Bertraud Rhine started for Bakersfield on Wednesday. Bert says he is likely to become a wild and wooly sheepman.

A. O. Collins passed through town on Wednesday on his way to Tulare county. He expects to return in about two weeks.

A. B. Hogan came up from Los Angeles on Thursday's stage and expects to return next Monday. Mr. Hogan is here on business connected with the Mt. Whitney Canal Company

L. F. J. Wrinkle came up from Keeler yesterday morning. He will return to Keeler to-day and start to-morrow morning for Pine Grove, where he is required in a mining suit.

Master Jay White of Hawthorne is at Independence, where he will remain in connection with the Index office. He is a son of George White of the Carson and Colorado Railroad.

A sheet and pillow-case party will be given at Mairs' Hall on Friday evening next, January 19th. A supper will be prepared at the Norman House. Admission ball $100, supper 50 cents a plate. A good time is assured.

There has been a heavy frost in Southern California. It is estimated that the damage to the orange crop at Riverside alone will amount to $100,000. Other localities suffered proportionately. Inyo County is very fortunate in being out of the citrus belt. We can raise just as valuable crops of deciduous fruits and no danger of destruction when nearly ready for market.

The Board of Supervisors appropriated $300 toward defraying the expenses of a display at the Mid-Winter Fair. In view of the fact that they had previously appropriated $420 for a similar purpose, making a $720 out of the $1,000 dolar limit, the action of the Board should be considered as most liberal, the opinion of the Index to the contrary not-with-standing.

Inyo Well Advertised.

The New Year's edition of the Los Angeles Herald contained forty-eight pages of highly interesting matter concerning Southern California. Among other articles describing the Southern counties was one on Inyo County, three columns and a half in length, by C. Mulholland. The article gives a thorough description of the agricultural and mineral interests of this County, the way to reach here, future possibilities etc. As the paper has been read by thousands of people, and the article referred to occupies a prominent position its value as an advertisement to Inyo County and Owens valley in particular, can hardly be over estimated. For several years past the Herald has published articles by the same writer that cannot help being of great benefit to this Valley. The attention of all Southern California is directed this way, substantial benefit has been received, and it is only a beginning of what will follow. No better mode of advertising the County can be used than to obtain say 500 copies of the Herald's New Year edition, which would cost the small sum of $25 and distribute them to parties who make inquiry in view of settling here. There are many such inquiries received, and this would be the best way of answering them. By obtaining the above number of copies of the Herald would also serve as a mild appreciation of the favor that journal has done us. This paper will start a list with $5. Who comes next?

Don't Be Backward In Coming Forward.

The Supervisors donated $300 for the Mid-Winter Fair, this being all they dared do in the present condition of County finances. At best they could only devote $580 for this purpose, so the subscription is not so bad. Now the Executive Committee call on all citizens of the County to put their shoulders to the wheel, subscribe to their local Committee and aid the matter. Mr. Wrinkle's map has been on exhibiton at the County seat. It is a fine piece of work, that will advertise the County's resources thoroughly, and need only be seen to be appreciated. Let every citizen do his share, both by subscription and making a display of his products, Inyo County will still be in good shape and make a showing that we can be proud of.

Reduced Rates.

During the period of the California Midwinter International Exposition, opening January 1 and closing June 30, 1894, excursion tickets to San Francisco and return will be sold by the Carson and Colorado Railway from Benton, Bishop, Alvord, Independence, Lone Pine and Keeler for $25.60. The tickets will bear four coupons of admission to the Fair. Children between five and twelve years of age will be charged one-half of above rates. If the holder of a ticket desires to stop over on return trip, he can secure a ticket at San Francisco which will allow stop-overs within the limit of such ticket. Such a ticket can be secured only upon the surrender (unused) of this ticket, and the payment of one-fifth of the regular fare from San Francisco to destination.

The large map of Inyo County to be used at the Mid-Winter Fair is a beautiful piece of work, and will prove of the greatest value to the County. It is now nearly completed and will soon be ready to forward. Parties having mines or other property, which they desire to have appear on the map, are requested to send in the location and particulars of same immediately.

Dr. Howell, Public Administrator, was at Lone Pine last Tuesday on business connected with the estate of E. L. Smith, deceased. The personal property of the estate was sold at good prices. Mr. Howell came up to Independence on Wednesday, and will return home to Bishop to-morrow.

Moved by Wilson to reconsider the vote taken during the morning session, concerning the matter of appropriating money for the Mid-Winter Fair. Seconded by Fitzgerald. So ordered by the following vote:

Ayes: Uhlmeyer, Wilson, Fitzgerald.

Nays: Freeman, Love.

Supervisor Fitzgerald in the chair.

Moved by Love, seconded by Freeman, that the action heretofore taken appropriating the sum of $125 in aid of Mining Exhibit at Mid-Winter Fair be reconsidered. Carried by following vote:

Ayes: Freeman, Fitzgerald, Love and Uhlmeyer.

No: Wilson

Whereupon, on motion of Love, seconded by Freeman, said order appropriating $125 was rescinded by the following vote.

Ayes: Freeman, Uhlmeyer, Wilson, Fitzgerald and Chairman Love.

Noes: None.

Supervisor Love in the Chair.

Ordered: That the County Auditor draw warrant upon the General Expense Fund in sum of $300 in favor of P. H. Mack for Mid-Winter Fair purposes as aforesaid.

Board adjourned until Saturday, January 6, 1894, at 9:30 o'clock a. m.

Attest: ROBERT LOVE,
D. J. HESSION, Clerk. Chairman.

SATURDAY, Jan. 6, 1894.

Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, met at above stated time pursuant to adjournment.

Present, Supervisors Freeman, Uhlmeyer, Wilson, Fitzgerald and Love, Chairman.

Minutes of preceding days proceedings read and approved.

Application of California Commissioners of the National Irrigation Congress asking for appropriation of $100 rejected.

Upon motion of Fitzgerald, seconded by Uhlmeyer, the claim of William Smale was taken up and reconsidered.

Upon motion of Fitzgerald, seconded by Freeman, said claim of William Smale, heretofore allowed in the sum of $398 85, was ordered paid in the sum of $585 15.

Upon motion of Freeman, seconded by Fitzgerald, the order heretofore made setting aside out of the Bridge Fund the sum of $256 for the construction of a bridge across the Rawson and Ford ditch, was reconsidered.

Ordered that said sum be replaced to the credit of the Bridge Fund.

County Ordinance No. 50, relative to and governing the collection of a Road Poll Tax for the year 1894, was adopted, passed and ordained by the following vote:

Ayes: Supervisors Fitzgerald, Freeman, Uhlmeyer, Wilson, Love.

Nays: None.

Upon motion of Fitzgerald seconded by Wilson, it was ordered that Supervisor Freeman of 2nd District be authorized to have repaired the floor of the branch jail at Bishop and to purchase one half dozen chairs for the Justice Court-room thereat.

Upon motion of Fitzgerald, seconded by Wilson: Ordered: That Commissioner Love of Road District No. 1 be authorized to post notice inviting proposals for the construction of a bridge across Bishop Creek between Cooly's and Hutchinson's ranches: That said Road Commissioner is authorized to complete such work at his option as may appear most advantageous.

Road adjourned to meet at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., at which hour reassembled all the members being present, Chairman Love presiding.

Ordered that J. F. Brown be authorized to cement the roof of the fire-proof vault at a cost not to exceed $12 for labor and if not water proof no pay.

County Ordinance No. 51, relating to the licensing of persons engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep in the County of Inyo for the year 1894 was adopted, passed and ordained by the following vote:

A SAFE DEPOSIT.

By REV. E. EVERETT HALE, D. D.

"I understand the president very well," said Edith firmly. "I meant to do justice to his argument before. But it seems to me to mean this—that because this woman was pretty she is to be excused for being wicked, and that because she was a woman it is to be expected that she will act like a fool."

They all laughed heartily at this, and the president hastened to say that this was not the center of his position; that Mary certainly had been very badly educated, etc., etc., etc., and that Bothwell had, etc., etc., etc., and that John Knox had, etc., etc., etc., and so on, and so on, as may be imagined.

"Still, I cannot see that this changes our opinion on the question whether she did right or wrong."

This was the unflinching reply of the stern Edith. "It shows why she did wrong, but it does not show that she did right—unless the president means that when a woman dresses her hair in a becoming way, and invents a new headdress, she may do as she chooses."

After this it may be imagined that the president and Edith were very good friends through the rest of that evening, and the reader will not be surprised that in the simple and admirable code of Tamworth and of that circle Edith asked him, as they ate their ice cream together, if he would do her the favor to walk home with her. She had not liked to fix a time for the carriage, she said. He gladly agreed to do so, as any young man in Tamworth would have been glad to do.

So soon as they were well in the street, away from light, Edith, who had studied out the whole conversation in advance, said to him: "I have a question of conscience on which I want the advice of a man—of a business man. My father is away for six weeks. I find there is a mistake about my money, and I have overdrawn at the bank on my private account. Now it happens that I have received $100 by accident—I know not from whom. It is lying in my desk unused. Should you think I might use that, as if it were lent to me, and repay it when my father comes home?"

The president heard her through, waited a moment and then said: "I believe at law you might. I doubt if you could be sued for doing it. But it is not a nice thing to do. If it had been you would not be in doubt yourself."

"Thank you," said Edith. "You feel just as I do." But he did not let her go on. "You see," he said, "your unknown correspondent might appear to-morrow morning, and you would want to have her money ready for her. You would do much better to borrow yourself at your bank or of some friend."

"I have so many friends," said Edith, more bitterly than she meant, "that I cannot select, and I am afraid my father would be wretchedly annoyed if he knew I was in this scrape, though really it is from no fault of mine. I cannot well borrow at the bank without saying that he has been careless or making people think so. It gives a certain publicity to the mistake he made when he thought that for six weeks I could—paddle my own canoe."

"I do not think there is such publicity as you fear. You see," said he good naturedly, "the bank people would be only too glad to lend your father's daughter anything. It can be most easily arranged. How much do you want?"

"Oh, I want as much as $250. These are all the subscriptions pa likes me to make—and"——

The young man laughed very lightly, as she thought.

"Pardon me," he said. "From your tone I thought you were going to say two hundred and fifty thousand. I wish, Miss Edith, you would let me lend it to you myself. You have been kind enough to ask my advice. Will you be good enough to take it?"

Edith was now taken wholly aback. She had chosen her adviser—as he said. Here was a proposal which would lift her out of the depths. For the instant she felt that if only she had the three bits of paper he spoke of she should be perfectly happy. She could see the two notes of one hundred—and one of fifty—clean two of them appeared, crisp and clean, and one flabby and dirty, before her mind's eye.

But she did not waver even for that instant. Her manner was kind enough, but absolutely firm as she declined. "You are quite right in saying that I had better ask the bank people. I will certainly do so. You are very kind, and I shall always be grateful to you for your willingness. But it will be better so."

"I hope you are not offended," said he, somewhat proudly. You seem to be distressed. We are not in a novel. I wanted to be of use. That is all."

"Offended—how could I be offended?" said she. "I asked for information and advice. You have given me both. I shall get out of my troubles now, I see. And I shall thank you for showing me how. Will you not come in? No? Good night, then." And she gave him her hand. "Please do not think I am offended."

It was very queer. If they had only known all would have been well. For this president of the Chautauqua Circle was Antony Blake. As it was they both went home, and for two or three hours neither of them went to sleep. "Ought I have said this? Why did I say that?" in all possible forms till nature and youth asserted themselves, and the provoking conversation was forgotten.

CHAPTER VIII.

Edith rose the next morning with a new resolution. She went to her desk as soon as breakfast was over and wrote this note:

LETTERS LOST.—A parcel of six letters, dated in May, 1883, and tied together with a white ribbon. The finder will be thanked and liberally rewarded if he will send a note to G. R., at the post-office.

This advertisement she inserted in The Argus of that day. The hope she had was well enough founded. But, alas! Antony hated the politics of The Argus, which pretended to be an independent paper, and was on any side which the proprietor thought profitable. Antony never looked at any part of The Argus, least of all at the advertisements. So poor Edith's notice might have been published a month and he would have been none the wiser.

On his part, he went to the Waverley bank and asked the cashier if he would lend him $250. "What collateral?" said the cashier, who was his old ally and friend. "None," said Antony, "unless you will take stock in the Self Acting Coupler corporation, not yet organized. But if you would indorse my note I think the directors would pass it."

"Nonsense," said the cashier. "Bank rules will not permit that. But if you want $250, old fellow, here it is. Give me a memorandum and pay me when you like. Make it to me. This is not the bank's money; it is mine. You know I am glad to serve you."

Antony thanked him and said, what was true, that he would do as much for him gladly. Then he went to the Amicable reading room and wrote to Edith this letter:

ANTONY BLAKE TO EDITH LANE.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, July 3.

MY DEAR MISS LANE—As I absolutely have these bills in my hand I take the liberty of asking you to use them as you will. There is no reason why you should have the annoyance of addressing the officers of the bank. Please imagine me to be president of the Waverley bank, as well as president of the Chautauqua circle. Very truly yours,

ANTONY BLAKE.

So poor Edith actually saw her way clear to pay all her debts by incurring this one very pleasant debt to this one very gentlemanly man. She asked the servant if the bearer were waiting and was told he had gone.

"Send James to me. I want to send a note down town."

EDITH LANE TO ANTONY BLAKE.

DEAR MR. BLAKE—You are most kind. But already I see my way out of my embarrassments, and I return the notes at once. Very truly yours,

EDITH LANE.

James found Antony at the St. Clair, where he had been bidden to go.

Antony did not quite like the note. It seemed to him a little shorter or more sharp than it need be. Anyway, if she could be proud he could also. He put the note in his pocket and turned it over in his mind all through a long interview which he had with the Rumrills, who had sent for him again.

Then he determined to call on Miss Edith that evening. But lest she should be out he wrote the following letter:

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, July 3.

MY DEAR MISS LANE—Lest I do not find you at home I venture to write. For I have at bottom the feeling that you think I have taken a liberty and presumed on the confidence which you gave me so generously last evening.

I want simply to say that you are unjust to me if you think so. I know that from the standard of the novel writers of fifty years ago my proposal was not to be heard of. But I think the standard of America is higher and better. I hope the standard of Tamworth is higher and better. I think men and women meet each other with mutual respect and mutual confidence. It is not in vain that we go to the same schools, work in the same causes, study in the same circles, and in a word live in the same life.

If you and I were "Henry and Emma" or "Paul and Virginia" or "Silly and Billy" or "Fergus and Evelyn" or any other absurd people in novel of course you would not wish to have me help you in any sensible way, and I should never think of proposing to. But seeing we are plain Tamworth people, members of the same church and officers in the same circle, I see no harm in what I have done, and I will not say I do. Truly yours,

ANTONY BLAKE.

When Edith came home late from a long drive which she had taken in the country this note was waiting for her.

She read it more than half through with approval of the young man's pluck and pride. But when she came to "Fergus and Evelyn" the words seemed to stand out of the paper.

Or was she crazy herself? Did she see words which were not there?

Or were there ever two other people in love with each other with those two names?

She read the note through and then went to her father's den. She looked in the Telephone Directory, and then asked for 297.

"Hello!

"Does Mr. Antony Blake live in the St. Clair?——

"Ask Mr. Antony Blake if he can come to No. 99 Curwen street."

In ten minutes Mr. Antony Blake was there, though it was half-past 10 at night.

"Mr. Blake, pardon me for troubling you, but who are Fergus and Evelyn?"

"I am sure I do not know. I wish I did," he said ruefully.

Poor Edith! She could have dropped on the floor for her disappointment.

"What did you mean then, Mr. Blake, when you said Silly and Billy, Evelyn and Fergus?"

She had read the words forty times while he was coming.

Now it was his turn to blush and stammer. Nor did he see how near was the crisis.

"Oh—only—well, you see—well, I once had some letters—I thought they were love letters—addressed to Evelyn Somebody and Fergus Somebody. I do not know who the Somebodys were. The letters were not mine. I put them away."

"Where did you put them? Where are they now?"

"Where? They are in my safe at the Amicable. I wish I knew where they ought to be."

And Edith was herself again. "Mr. Blake, I think it is for me to turn over to you some property of yours I have here. Indeed, I did not steal it. But are not these Cattaraugus bonds yours, and this hundred dollars, perhaps, too?" And she handed him the well known parcel.

CHAPTER IX.

Mr. Lane's absence in England was prolonged, and it was September before he returned. Edith met him at the Tamworth station with the carriage to bring him home.

"I have so much to tell you, papa, and I do not know how to begin."

"It is clear that it is good news," said he; "you look so well. And you are a good woman of business—that has appeared all through from your letters."

"That you will have to judge of, papa." At that moment as they crossed the station her father saw Antony Blake, pressed his hand warmly and asked him to come and see them, which Antony said he would gladly do.

"That young man," said Mr. Lane as they entered the carriage, "is one of the most successful young men in this state. Whyncliffe has been talking to me about him half the time as we came on from New York. Why, Edith, he has an invention which will save thousands of lives and must be used on every railroad. He has established a new machine shop here to make his couplings, and Whyncliffe and all of them are crazy about him.

"But, Edith, he is no stranger to you; you used to know him. He is the same man who was in your reading club."

"I have so much to tell you, papa."

"Yes, papa—and, papa, he has asked me to marry him, and I have told him I would ask you. But really, papa, he is the best man in the world, and I shall never marry any one else."

Thus it was that Edith made her revelation. It was not until the wedding day, however, that she told her father that the new machine shop was built with the proceeds of the sales of her governments and C., B. and Q.'s.

THE END.

The Sultan's Table Etiquette.

The sultan never uses a plate. He takes all his food direct from the little kettles, and never uses a table and rarely a knife or fork—a spoon, his bread, a pancake or fingers are found far handier. It requires just twice as many slaves as there are courses to serve a dinner to him.

The whole household is at liberty to take meals where it suits him or her best, and thus every one is served with a small tray, with a spoon, a great chunk of bread, and the higher ones only get the pancakes.

Nearly one ton of rice per day is required for the inevitable pillaffe, 600 pounds of sugar, as much coffee, to say nothing of the other groceries, fruit, vegetables and meat. Rice and mutton and bread form the greater part of the food for the majority of Turks, together with fish, sweetmeats, confectionery, nuts and dried and fresh fruits.

That there is enormous waste and extravagance in the kitchens is obvious, and it is said that enough is thrown away daily to maintain 100 families; but such waste is perhaps not confined to a Turkish royal household, and might also be found in kitchens nearer home.

The surplus is gathered up by the beggars, in whom Constantinople abounds, and what still remains is eaten by the scavenger dogs.

All the water for the sultan's use and the drinking water for the household is brought in barrels from two pretty streams at different places in the Bosphorous toward the Black sea.—Exchange.

Our Style of Writing.

About 450 B. C. the Ionians first introduced the present system of writing from left to right. Previous to the above date from right to left prevailed, although the method called boustrophedon (that is, alternately from right to left and from left to right) was somewhat extensively practiced. The ancient Hebrew and Greek languages were written from right to left until about 450 B. C., when the form of the Greek letters was changed from the unical to the cursive, and the manner of writing changed from right to left to left to right.—St. Louis Republic.

About How He Felt.

Mr. and Mrs. Fitts were out driving. "I wonder," said she, "just what the poor horse's feelings are? It must be just horrid to be driven and dragged around, without any idea as to where one is going, except as some one directs.'

"I fancy I can appreciate his feelings,' replied Mr. Fitts calmly. "I imagine he feels just about as I do when you take me out on a shopping trip."—London Tit-Bits.

An Idol Destroyed.

"There has been a great deal written about the wonderful memories of hotel clerks, but let me tell you it's all bosh," said a well known member of the craft. "Of course a clerk has to have a good memory, but so has any man in business. And it is quite true that training one's memory in a certain line makes it more agile in that direction than the memory of a man of different vocation is likely to be. But what I refer to is the talk about the memory of the hotel clerk being phenomenal, and, to prove it, citing instances how seeing a stranger once the clerk recognizes and calls him by name ten years later, though not having seen him in the interval. It's nonsense. And though the guest in question may answer 'tis a fact, he is but deceived by the regulation trick. You take sharp notice some time and you will see a man approach the counter.

"If that man has ever stopped at the hotel before he will recognize the clerk. And the clerk, seeing the spark of recognition in the eye of the guest whose name he doesn't remember from Adam, holds out his hand and grabs that of the guest, shakes it heartily as with the other hand he shoves the register toward him and gives him a pen, at the same time firing at him a lot of questions such as 'Well, where did you spring from this time? Where have you been all this time? You are looking well; family ditto? How's business? Want room with bath? and so on until the guest has registered. Then the clerk rings in the guest's name before the owner has time to see if it is spelled right. It's a simple trick; but its performance not only causes the one upon whom it is played to feel more at home, but to marvel ever afterward at the wonderful memory of the hotel clerk."—Chicago Post.

Pigeons Do Not Fly by Sight.

The numerous experiments made by balloonists have proved that pigeons are incapable of flying at any great height. Birds thrown out at 6,000 meters fell like dead, and even at the moderate height of 300 meters pigeons liberated by the balloonist Gaston Tissandier approached the earth in a spiral course. It is evident, hence, that they are not guided wholly by sight. To bring a point 300 miles distant within the range of vision it would be necessary to ascend nearly 20,000 meters. The carrier pigeon, starting on such a journey, must consequently start with faith in the unseen.—Philadelphia Press.

The Fickle and Raging Missouri.

The current of the Mississippi river averages from 2½ to 4 miles an hour in velocity, but a steamboatman on the Missouri would be pretty apt to call this still water, as that stream bowls along under ordinary circumstances at the rate of 8 and 10 miles an hour, and on state occasions it develops the speed of an avalanche. Engineers consider bridging the Missouri a difficult accomplishment, as the swift current is so versatile in its course and ruinous in its velocity that it is impossible to predict where the channel is liable to drift.—Alton Sentinel.

CHANGE OF NAME.

For some time it has been evident that the name Sherwood Hall Nursery Co. did not indicate the full scope of our business, which includes all garden requisites. It has therefore been deemed advisable to adopt the name Sunset Seed and Plant Co. This is merely a change of name, the personnel, affairs and location of the business remaining as formerly. As hitherto, all orders entrusted to us will be executed carefully and promptly. Sunset Seed and Plant Co., 427-9 Sansome Street, San Francisco. Seed farm and nurseries, Menlo Park.

A HERALD OF THE INFANT YEAR.

Clip the last thirty years or more from the century, and the segment will represent the term of the unbounded popularity of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The opening of the year 1894 will be signalized by the appearance of a fresh Almanac of the Bitters, in which the uses, derivation and action of this world-famous medicine will be lucidly set forth. Everybody should read it. The calendar and astronomical calculations to be found in this brochure are always astonishingly accurate, and the statistics, illustrations, humor and other reading matter rich in interest and full of profit. The Hostetter Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., publish it themselves. They employ more than sixty hands in the mechanical work, and more than eleven months in the year are consumed in its preparation. It can be obtained, without cost, of all druggists and country dealers, and is printed in English, German, French, Welsh, Norwegian, Swedish, Holland, Bohemian and Spanish.

People who cross a bridge before they get to it always pay high toll.

THERE ARE SOME PEARLS.

There are some pearls which lie beneath the sea—
So deep, so deep,
No diver's hand can reach, nor eye behold.
The waters keep
Their treasures safely hid and all untold,
Through years and years, through storms that o'er it whirl.

Fairer than other pearls, perhaps, this pearl.
There are some thoughts which lie within the soul—
So far, so far;
So deep within the heart's most secret cell,
Like some hid star,
That but this heart its whispers sweet can tell.
Safe hid away and treasured and unsought,
Fairer than other thoughts, perhaps, this thought.

—Cora Fabbri.

A PORPHYRY CASKET.

In the boudoir of the Signora di Carnese, in a small, beautifully decorated shrine affixed to the wall, is a singular object which has excited the curiosity of all who have seen it. It is a small porphyry casket, oblong in shape and fastened with chased gold bands. It was made, it is said, at the signora's order by one of the most famous artists in Rome, and is no less quaint in design than exquisite in finish. On one side, cut into the stone, is the single word amor, and a date.

For what purpose it was made, what it contains and why it is placed in the shrine as if it were a sacred relic, few or none of the signora's acquaintances know. She has been asked these questions many times, and her only reply is, "Something more valuable to me than all my other possessions put together," and the signora is a very rich woman.

She has never been known to open the casket, and indeed it is so banded and bolted together that it would require extraordinary effort to break it apart. No one is allowed to touch it. The signora dusts and cares for it with her own hands, and it has been observed that at such times her ordinarily haughty air gives place to one of mournful humility, mingled with almost religious reverence.

This is the story of the porphyry casket.

The gossips of society said that Olivia Anfiedi had resolved either to marry into a royal family or die single. Sons of noble Roman families, merchant princes, foreign embassadors, diplomats and soldiers had sued for her favor and failed. She had refused offers the very thought of which had embittered the soul of many a Roman beauty with the gall of envy. For all the emotion she had exhibited at the passionate pleading of her suitors she might have been a statue of ice.

She was the only daughter of an ancient ducal family of Rimini, and the pride and beauty of her race had descended to her undiminished. Her hair, slightly waving, was of a glistening black, save when the sunlight touched it, when faint coppery tints and red gleams flickered in its glossy depths. Her eyes in her calm moments were dark violet, but changed with her moods from cold steel gray to glowing dusk, like the sky in a moonless August night. She was pale, with the pallor of a perfect opal beneath whose surface the soft hues come and go ceaselessly. Many a sculptor, catching a glimpse of her figure, and with its stately grace and voluptuous curves, had dreamed over it in his studio, vainly striving to fix some hint of it in the plastic clay. Many a man had gone from her presence with a sorrowful longing at his heart, knowing full well that she was not for him. Yet to look at her face was to comprehend that if she ever should love it would be with a passionate devotion which few women are capable of and few men can appreciate.

In the very height of her reign, when, to use scarcely too extravagant a metaphor, all Rome was at her feet, there came to the city a poor student from the old university of Padua. Marco Carnese had the dark, handsome features, the brilliant black eyes, the lithe figure and the fiery passion of the Sicilians. His fine talents had won him some fame and a fellowship in his college there, and the threadbare suit he wore constituted almost his sole possessions. His poverty had increased his natural reserve, and he lived in Rome, friendless and solitary, buried in the seclusion of his ill furnished garret.

It seemed the merest irony that Marco should meet Olivia Anfiedi and fall madly in love with her, but so it was. She, too, had noticed the handsome student, with his mournful expression and reserved air, and had he been of her own grade of life, it is possible that she might have looked upon his love with favorable eyes. As it was she passed him with cold indifference, less bearable to his pride than downright contempt.

He was not blind to the wide gulf between their respective stations; nor to the utter hopelessness of his passion. But he did not pause to reflect; he could think of nothing but that he worshiped her with a worship that was like a consuming flame. He could not keep away from her. It seemed as if he drew his life from her presence; and yet the sight of her beautiful face, so near and yet so utterly removed from him, was a torture.

Denied her house, he followed her at a distance in the street; always with the same mute, imploring look. He managed to introduce himself into the dwellings where she visited; and often at night, glancing about the drawing room, she met his dark, mournful eyes resting upon her in passionate adoration.

He had ventured to address her, in low, trembling tones. She had replied with a freezing reserve that would have changed the love of most men into hatred. With Marco Carnese it merely added fuel to the flame.

One night he followed her into the orangery of a mansion where they were both guests, hardly knowing what he wished or meant to do. Seeing her there alone, he approached her, and suddenly throwing himself upon his knees at her feet he poured out his passion in a torrent of words which would have swept away the resistance of many women. She only looked down at him with a curling lip.

"You are mad, signor," she said.

"Yes," he exclaimed, "I am mad—you, so noble, rich and honored; I so poor, humble and unknown! It is madness. But ah, how gladly I would die for one smile, one look of love from you, beautiful one!"

"You are offensive, signor," she said, with exasperating calmness. "Either leave me or permit me to pass."

He arose with flaming cheek, and stood with bent head as she swept haughtily by him as if he had been an impertinent menial. He had made himself ridiculous in her eyes! She despised him!

Any other man would have been utterly overwhelmed by such a rebuff. But as he had said, he was mad. For a few days he buried himself in the seclusion of his garret, suffering only as such natures can suffer. Then he emerged, and again was seen, with his melancholy eyes and appealing expression, haunting Olivia Anfiedi like an importunate and irrepressible phantom.

Everybody in Rome knew of the hopeless passion of the threadbare Sicilian for the noble lady. But it was little to him if they made a mock of his love. In all the world he saw only her, thought only of her. A glimpse of her beautiful face, albeit cold as marble to him, was food and drink, life itself to the poor scholar. All else was less than nothing in his thoughts.

He discovered that she went on foot every afternoon to attend vespers at the Church of St. Lucia, in the Via Trajano. At first he contented himself with watching her from the shadow of a pillar and following her homeward at a distance. In the church, no saint depicted upon its walls, or shrined above its altars received such homage from those who worshiped there as did the beautiful devotee from the unhappy lover. Whether she knew it or not was impossible to discover from her impassive face, a hundred times more impassive than usual when she detected the sorrowful eyes fixed upon her as she knelt.

One evening, when she had lingered longer than usual and the few worshipers had departed, leaving her alone with him in the church, he accosted her.

He began by a stammering appeal for pardon for his boldness; but surveying him with a look of haughty surprise she would have passed out of the church without a word, had he not placed himself before her.

"You shall listen to me," he said hotly. "I love you; I am dying for you. God did not give you such beauty that you might destroy those who adore you with cruelty. Have you no word of kindness for me—no pity?"

"Allow me to pass," was her reply, "or I will call the sacristan."

"Have you no heart?" he cried violently "Am I to listen to the ravings of every adventurer who crosses my path?" she said, in the same cold tone.

"Adventurer!" he gasped, his face flushing a deep crimson with rage and shame, "I an adventurer!"

"What else?" she replied calmly. "How should you dare—a beggar in rags—speak of love to me?"

If she had meant to insult and exasperate him, she had succeeded but too well. With his eyes starting from his head, and the foam on his lips, he glared at her a moment; then, lifting his hand, he struck her. It was an act of frenzy, the concentration of his long suffering and despair in one supreme moment of utter abandon.

The next instant he was groveling upon the ground, kissing the hem of her garment, bathing it in tears and sobbing prayers for pardon, self accusations, curses upon his own brutality; while she, towering above him in her outraged pride, gazed down at him with white face and flashing eyes. "Coward!" she said in a slow, deep tone; "coward!"

"Yes, yes," he cried, still kneeling; "worse than a coward! a villain, a dog! Oh, that I, who would have died for you, should have done this! Blasted be the hand that was raised against you! But you shall be revenged. Yes, I myself will revenge you."

She made no reply, but pushing him aside with her foot, went out of the church, leaving him kneeling upon the floor, weeping and calling maledictions down upon his own head.

The next morning before she had arisen her maid brought her a parcel which had been left at the door by a messenger. Supposing it to be some article from a tradesman she untied the wrapping and found beneath a small wooden box. Removing the lid she gazed within and dropped the box with a cry of horror.

There, at the bottom of the box, its fingers contracted, as with the agony of the blow, was a man's hand severed at the wrist! A bit of paper lay beside it on which were written these words:

"The infamous hand that desecrated love. You are revenged."

For a long time she lay silent and thoughtful, with the strange parcel beside her. Gradually the cold, proud expression of her features gave place to a look never seen there before. At last she arose, and gazing at the severed hand for some moments lifted it from the box and kissed the lifeless fingers.

All that day she remained at home, in the seclusion of her chamber, and all day a curious struggle seemed to be going on in her mind. Now she paced to and fro in an agitated way; again she sat in her chair with her cheek resting upon her hand, buried in profound meditation.

At nightfall she suddenly arose, dressed herself in a plain walking costume, and putting on a thick veil left the house alone. There was no hesitation in her step as she went along the darkened streets toward the commoner quarter of the city.

Arriving before a large, gloomy building, whose tenants were evidently of the poorer class, she spoke to the concierge:

"You have a sick gentleman among your lodgers?"

"Signor Carnese?" replied the man. "Oh, yes, poor young gentleman. He is badly wounded. He will not say how, but"——

"Show me his room."

Whatever questions he might have felt inclined to ask were effectually silenced by the piece of gold thrust into his hand. Leading the way to the very top of the house, he pointed to a door, and saying "That is his room, signora," took himself down stairs again.

She entered the apartment cautiously. The poor scholar was lying upon his bed with his face to the wall—she could see, even in the darkened chamber, how haggard and white it was. Outside of the coverlet rested his right arm, bandaged at the wrist. As she approached him he stirred and moaned:

"Water."

She found a glass upon the stand near at hand and placed it to his lips. She removed her veil, and as she bent over him he saw her face.

"You!" he said, striving to rise. But she pressed him gently back upon the pillow.

"Yes," she answered softly, "it is I."

"Ah," he sighed, "now I can die happy."

"On the contrary," she replied, "you must live—for my sake, Marco."

Poor Marco's chief danger now was that he might indeed die of pure happiness. But he did not die, for seldom has a man been nursed in illness and pain as he was nursed by the woman who had once scorned him, but in the sudden awakening of her own heart had discovered the worth of such love as his.

"Yes," she said, when he was convalescent at last and able to sit up in his chair by the window, "when I saw that poor hand something in my heart seemed to melt and give way, and I knew that I loved you, Marco."

It is her husband's right hand, the hand that smote her in the church of St. Lucia, the hand of the man she loved as few men have been loved, that is kept in the porphyry casket in the boudoir of the Signora Carnese.—Charles Lorin Hildreth in Philadelphia Press.

BEAUTY'S VICTIM.

How a Pair of Blue Eyes Conquered a Lawyer and Lost Him His Case.

A LOVELY, TEAR STAINED WITNESS.

The Attorney Was Handsome and Clever, and Lost His Head.—But He Won Sweet Revenge.

A special bill is to be passed by parliament restricting cross examination of witnesses. Her majesty is reported to have said that the present procedure of the English law courts "is far more likely to retard than to assist justice, as persons able to give evidence are very liable to avoid doing so, if possible, in view of the indecent manner in which they are likely to be interrogated regarding their private affairs." Concerning this a remarkable story is told.

A few years ago an important case was tried in the probate court. A title to a valuable property was in dispute. One of the lawyers was a middle aged man, eminent in his profession. Sensitive himself, and therefore the better able to know the feelings of others, he was, moreover, a handsome man and a bachelor. The case had progressed most satisfactorily for the plaintiff—the client of Mr. Delaunay, the counsel in question. Indeed, the lawyer himself felt assurance of ultimate victory. There was one more witness to be examined.

The defendant's counsel called for Miss Rose Waverly, and the name was gruffly repeated by the clerk of the court. There was the delicate rustle of a woman's dress and an unconscious deference of men standing near as the lady passed them. A moment later she was in the witness box and had composedly gone through the usual formalities before giving evidence.

A BEAUTIFUL WITNESS.

Mr. Delaunay, at the time of her entrance, was idly chatting with a friend, well nigh assured of his victory. He leisurely turned his eyes in the direction of the defendant's fair witness. There stood the loveliest vision of a woman his eyes had ever beheld. Even the judge looked at Miss Waverly with undisguised admiration.

All in court fell under the spell of dainty womanhood until Miss Waverly, standing there with smiling frankness of demeanor, turned with a momentary look of distress to the judge. The chivalric sentiments of the men were touched. In a voice low and sweet Miss Waverly replied to all the questions. She must have known instinctively that the sympathies of the whole court were with her, and certainly the testimony she gave helped the defendant's case. Delaunay, while listening to her replies, saw where a little shrewd cross examination would somewhat shatter her statements and throw doubt on the others, and so making a few pencil notes in his brief, he bided his time.

Presently the opposing counsel sat down, looking well satisfied, and George Delaunay had to cross examine. It may be said that Miss Waverly rose to the occasion. She had heard of the eminence and searching eloquence of her questioner, and resolutely met his gaze. "More marriages," it has been said, "have been made by beauty of the eyes than by any other qualities that woman possesses."

Mr. Delaunay's first questions were couched in the usual tone of kindly inquiry that he generally adopted, a tone to lead the listener into pitfalls of fancied security. She answered his queries collectedly and to the point without unnecessary revelations, once or twice in words that seemed spoken directly to him, and these were veritable music to his ear.

LOST A CASE BUT WON A WIFE.

It was at the end of a long question to which she had succinctly replied that he paused a moment and studied some of his penciled memoranda.

While he was studying and condensing the form he should present his questions, by a reflex action his mind was condemning the means. However, the simple duty to his client overrode the scruples of his heart; he looked up suddenly with a frown at his own indecision and met her direct gaze. Her eyes were blue as sapphires and they were full of tears.

The barrister substituted another question for the severe one he had intended to ask. There was the faintest tremor in her voice as she replied. She was frightened, perhaps tired, and the man's heart expanded and went out in pity to her.

Miss Waverly stood there in brave silence, looking with wet eyes straight before her, only the pathetic droop of a perfect mouth marking the sense of timorous womanhood within her, and George Delaunay sat down. He made a remarkably clever speech, but he lost his case.

It was the opinion of many of the legal fraternity that Delaunay would have won the case had he not so unaccountably failed in his cross examination of the last witness. It is reported that the judge casually mentioned to his wife that a Miss Rose Waverly had saved the case, and that his wife afterward told her dearest friend, whereby that section of the city wherein they lived were made acquainted.

There is one other fact to be noted.

Mr. Delaunay lost no time in making the acquaintance of the "last witness" and marrying her; and as all stories should end happily in fiction, and also, if possible, in real life, it is pleasant to add that never was a couple married in London who loved each other more devotedly.—London Telegraph.

Second Marriages.

Mrs. Williams, who is principal of the New York training school for teachers, is a believer in second marriages. In an interview on this subject she said: "I believe the matrimonial state, once entered into, should be continued in, if possible, and that a man or woman left alone should seek to renew ties. I don't mean by this that they should rashly jump at the first offer, but I do know that eligible husbands and wives will meet congenial spirits soon enough always, and when they do they should not shirk their fate—I really think I should say their duty.

Man's and woman's sphere is immensely widened by marriage. They fall into a single state again and their sphere contracts and their social influence is diminished. The world holds too many narrow lives, too many that will never leave any moral impress behind. Then don't you think when people have learned to wisely fulfill the duties of marriage, which we all know is a blessing, that they ought to assume the responsibilities happily a second time?—Chicago Post.

The Lawyers' Patron Saint.

"Did you know," asked the lawyer, "that the legal profession is the only profession that has no patron saint—at least none that it will own?"

"What's the reason for that?" I asked.

"I don't know," answered the lawyer. "Carelessness, I suppose. When the saints were handed around, the representative who should have been present was probably arguing with the judge in another court."

"What did you mean by 'At least none that it will own?'" I asked.

"Many years ago," was the reply, "an Irish lawyer, who was a fervent Catholic, sought to provide his profession with a patron saint. So genuine was his desire for one that he traveled to Rome to consult the pope. The pope graciously received him.

"'Pray, your holiness,' said the Irishman, 'grant the lawyers a patron saint.'

"According to the story, which is a very venerable one, the pope looked over the list and found that there were no saints that had not been given to the other professions, at which the Irish lawyer was much cast down. Observing his depression, the pope bade him cheer up and then directed him to go to a church near by, to blindfold himself and to pass around the interior saying Ave Marias all the time.

"'And,' said the pope, 'the first saint you touch shall be the patron saint of your profession.'

"Much gratified, the devout lawyer went away to follow the instructions. He passed around the church praying. When he stopped he put out his hand. He was in front of the altar of St. Michael.

"'Be thou the lawyers' patron saint?' he cried and pulled off the bandage. Alas, he wasn't touching St. Michael at all! His hand was resting on the devil under St. Michael's feet."—New York Herald.

A Physician's Opinion on Weeping.

As the muscular power that extends or flexes a finger is at a distance from the part moved, so the excitement to tears is from an irritation in a distant nervous center and is removed when the nervous center is either soothed or exhausted. The persons who weep say that tears afford relief. Nothing is more perfectly true, nothing more clear when the facts are understood. The relief comes not from the mere escape of tears, which is only a symptom, but from the cessation of the storm in the nervous chain.

If the storm be calmed by soothing measures, as when we soothe a child that is weeping from fear, annoyance or injury, we quiet the nervous centers, upon which the effect ceases. In children the soothing method succeeds, and sometimes it succeeds in adults, although in adults the cessation of tears is more commonly due to actual exhaustion following a period of nervous activity.

In grief, the afflicted weep until they can weep no more; then they become calm, or, like children, cry themselves to sleep. Thus tears indicate relief, and that the nervous system has fallen into the repose of weariness. Persons subjected to many and repeated griefs shed in time fewer tears, and the aged compared with the younger are almost tearless.—Dr. W. B. Richardson in Asclepiad.

How Scissors Are Made.

Though no complexities are involved in the making of scissors or much skill required, yet the process of manufacture is very interesting. They are forged from good bar steel heated to redness, each blade being cut off with sufficient metal to form the shank, or that destined to become the cutting part, and bow, or that which later on is fashioned into the holding portion. For the bow a small hole is punched, and this is afterward expanded to the required size by hammering it on a conical anvil, after which both shank and bow are filed into a more perfect shape and the hole bored in the middle, for the rivet. The blades are next ground and the handles filed smooth and burnished with oil and emery, after which the pairs are fitted together and tested as to their easy working.

They are not yet finished, however; they have to undergo hardening and tempering and be again adjusted, after which they are finally put together again and polished for the third time. In comparing the edges of knives and scissors it will be noticed of course that the latter are not in any way so sharply ground as the former, and that in cutting, scissors crush and bruise more than knives.—Montreal Star.

The Bloodhound Not Ferocious.

One of the loveliest dogs ever bred, one of the gentlest and most loyal, has by some curious misapprehension of his qualities fallen into such disrepute that the legislature of the state of Massachusetts has enacted a statute which makes it a misdemeanor for any one to keep a dog of this breeding within the commonwealth. This is the bloodhound, which is generally supposed to follow the trail of men, and, catching them, to rend their human victims limb from limb. If this were the characteristic of the dog I should not blame those who have contributed to his disrepute.

But as a matter of fact a well bred and well trained bloodhound would no more think of jumping upon and biting his quarry than would a pointer spring upon the pheasant or partridge he had scented. His business is not to kill game, but to find it. I have seen a manhunt in the hills of Vermont, the only place where the pure English bloodhound is bred, and when the dogs came up with the men they had trailed they only showed delight at their success, and by their cessation from barking indicated to the huntsman that they had found their game.—Christian Union.

One of Spurgeon's Stories.

Rev. Dr. Charles Wood, of the First Presbyterian church, Germantown, tells a good story at his own expense about Spurgeon. Dr. Wood while in London was telling Spurgeon that he was going to Germany to study.

"Haven't you any theological seminaries in America?" asked Spurgeon.

"Yes," said Dr. Wood, "but I don't think I know everything though I graduated at Princeton, and I am going to Germany to try and learn more."

"Well," said Spurgeon, "I hope you will not be like the calf I once heard of. The milk of one cow wasn't enough for it, and they gave it the milk of two, and the more milk it drank the more of a calf it became."—Philadelphia Press.

An Ancient River.

In Long Island sound, not far from the north shore of the island, is clearly defined the channel of an ancient river. As shown by the United States coast survey it is a gorge, having a depth of about sixty feet below the general floor of the sound on either side of it. The gorge or channel was cut into the bedrock of gneiss, the erosion of which is exceedingly slow.—Philadelphia Ledger.

TALES OF THE SEA

Two Ships That Came Together in a Storm Without Damage.

A REMARKABLE COLLISION.

Strange Fate of a Staunch Vessel Recalled by the Sight of a Flag.—A Gallant Deed.

Let people who think there are no Yankee sailors in these days go down to Fred Colcott's, in South street. It is true that one will find very few Yankees who are sailing before the mast, but the Yankee captain, and the Yankee first mate, and the Yankee second mate, and the Yankee who used to be one or the other, but has since obtained a soft berth on shore, gather at Colcott's to spin sea twisters fit to make the landsman gasp.

"Ever know Captain Lawson—E. J. Lawson? He's in the carpet department of one of those big Brooklyn stores now," said one of the story spinning crew yesterday. "Twenty odd years ago he was one of a crew of the brigantine Hattie Bishop, Captain Weber. She sailed out of Portland one day with plaster for New York. Off Cape Cod it came on to blow hard, and the fog was that thick you couldn't see three ship's lengths away. So they headed her off shore across the Georges, where they came so near running down a fisherman that it made goose pimples rise all over them, and then, with only a balance reefed mainsail, a lower topsail and two staysails to keep her going, they held on very comfortably until after 10 o'clock.

"Lawson had the wheel that trick, and it was the second mate's watch. Lawson had been there half an hour when the second mate saw a light to windward, and the next minute a great British bark, running light and free, loomed out of the fog, headed right across the bows of the little brig. Captain Weber ordered the wheel up, and up it went, while the bark's wheel was put down, but in a minute more Captain Weber saw that it was too late.

CAPTAIN LAWSON'S EXPERIENCE.

"'Well, here we go, boys!' said he, and then before any one could say another word the bark rose over one wave, the brig over another, and sinking down in the trough between the two vessels came together, broadside on, with a tremendous crash. The blow broke off the stanchions all along the weather side of the brig and knocked the men of the watch below from their berths, but by some miracle neither mast nor yard was injured. As the watch below came tumbling up on deck the next wave lifted and parted the two vessels, but they crashed together a second time immediately after, and then within a minute a third time. Then the two forged apart, the bark carrying the brig's anchor, which had in some way caught in her chains, and hauling out twenty-five fathoms of the chain cable before the stock broke.

"Then there was a skurrying about to see what damage had been done. A few minutes later, as the brig plumped her nose into the sea, a man was washed away, and Lawson heard cries for help alongside. None could be rendered, but the man's leg caught on a drifting rope and he climbed on board. Then, to the astonishment of every one, both the brig and the bark were found tight as a bottle. It is probably the only case on record where two vessels collided in a gale of wind and yet neither vessel was seriously hurt."

"There is a flag in the possession of a sailor's wife living out on Long Island," said another of the party, "that was once the ensign of the brig City Mole, of Portland, Captain Hugh Sinnett. The flag was given to the lady as a token of appreciation of what you may call the gallant act of her husband. I'm sorry I've forgotten his name.

"The City Mole sailed from Savannah one day in September with hard pine for Porto Rico. She had eight men all told on board. The second day out she took a cyclone and got into such a rough sea that there was no keeping the solid water off her deck. First a wave came over and crushed in the booby hatch. The next jumped the flying jibboom out of her, the fore and main topmasts broke short off, the canvas was blown away, and there she was, as unmanageable as a raft, and the water pouring into the hull at every roll.

A THOUGHTFUL CAPTAIN.

"Of course she was waterlogged within half an hour, and the waves were making a clean sweep. Boats, the galley, spare spars, water barrels and everything movable about deck went overboard, while the afterhouse was cleaned out, but the roof remained solid, and there the crew found refuge. All of them but the captain at once lashed themselves fast, because the waves at intervals made a breach clear across the roof. The captain did so, too, after awhile. He had fallen asleep through exhaustion when a wave caught him and away he went. Waking suddenly, he made a grasp at the housetop and drove a ringbolt clear through his right hand. His body swung around over the side into the sea, but the bolt sticking through his hand held fast, as did the nerves and muscles of the hand, and his life was saved.

"For three days the crew lay on the housetop, almost helpless. Fortunately, the ship's flag was saved, and this was set, union down, on a scantling nailed to the house. On the evening of the third day a little brig belonging on Long Island came along, and the distress signal was seen. The water around was strewn with lumber that had been knocked out of the broken hull, but the Long Islander got close to the wreck and shouted that he would 'stand by until morning.' The sea was still too high and the night too near for a rescue.

"The crew had, before this brig appeared, become hopeless, and one man had gone crazy, for they had had neither food nor drink since the disaster. Now all but the insane man were greatly revived, and the night was passed in comparatively good cheer. You can imagine, then, how they felt when morning came and the Long Islander nowhere in sight.

"However, that skipper was a genuine Yankee sailor. He cruised about until noon looking for the wreck, and then, although a wind that would let him lay his course was blowing, he determined to sail thirty miles down wind before giving up the search. Just at sundown he overtook the wreck, which, having the foreyard crossed with some strips of the sail on it, had drifted with the wind.

"The Long Islander had his wife with him. When Captain Sinnett had been hoisted from the wreck he asked that the flag be given to the lady, and it was done."

At breakfast cheerfulness can be insisted upon and acquired, and all may be banished in this morning reunion that can grieve and worry. An advantage is gained, then, at the outset, whatever may befall

A Lie Told In School.

It has always been father's purpose to give his children a fair education, but as the family increased in size and numbers and father's salary would not grow in the same proportion, he found it necessary to cut down some of the avenues of expenditure. One of his first thoughts was that of the shoe bill for the family. Said he, "I'll be the cobbler when any shoes need repairing after this." Unfortunately my shoes gave out first, and the next day was set for repair day. Father brought from the shop where he was working some of the old belting that had been laid by. This leather was thoroughly saturated with oil, and as I entered the schoolroom next day with new taps on my shoes the oil would form a mark on the floor, just like a footprint on the newly fallen snow, and what good excuse to tell I couldn't think of.

It became an eyesore to the whole school, and I was wishing somehow I might take a vacation. Finally the teacher noticed it. I was called up to the desk, leaving my track all the way, and asked to explain. Shaking like a leaf, I told the story. My brother Jack and I had got to fighting the other day in the cellar, and he threw me in a pan of grease that was near by cooling. That lie settled the teacher, but the other element of the school were not satisfied until they stood me on my head and looked at my shoes.—Cor. New York Recorder.

In a City Restaurant.

A trifling incident noted not long ago in a city restaurant tells its own story and needs no spoken moral. Two girls, possibly attendants in a shop, were sitting together eating their luncheon, and one was holding forth to her companion on an experience which had just befallen her.

"I came in here," said she, "and got this seat, but wan't long before an old lady came in and sat next to me. She took off one pair of glasses and put on another. Then she stared and stared at the bill of fare and laid it down. I thought first she couldn't read a word. Then she turned around to me.

"'Will you let me sit next to the window?' says she.

"I didn't take any notice, and in a minute she said it again. Then I answered her:

"'No,' says I, 'this is my seat, and I'm going to keep it.'

"She turned 'way round in her chair then and looked me all over. Then she looked away. But I guess she knew I'd got the best of her, for she did have the manners to say:

"'I beg your pardon.'

"She spoke real low, and I noticed she looked kind of surprised."—Youth's Companion.

Sticks In Mercantile Life.

Many young men choose a mercantile position for the present only without thought or intention of making it a permanent business. The result is that oftentimes we find these men at 30 years receiving no more pay than they did when only 18.

There is an army of this class of young men behind counters today. They are an aimless, pitiable class. They stand listlessly in their departments and are as unobservant of what's going on around them as are the inanimate figures which one sees at the entrance of clothing establishments.

Many of them let slip grand opportunities of becoming great business factors in the commercial world and have doomed themselves to the treadmill of common drudgery. Singleness of purpose implies self reliance, without which a young business man is not thoroughly furnished for a successful business career.—Dry Goods Economist.

Pleasure In the Heavens.

There is a satisfaction in learning the names and positions of the stars that does not belong to the study of the planets. The stars apparently never change so far as their position relative to each other is concerned. The planets are always moving, and to those who do not watch the heavens with particular attention it is a cause of surprise very often to find a "new star" adorning a certain section of the heavens. If, however, this newcomer be carefully observed from night to night, it will be found to change its distance from the fixed stars, and the observer will discover that it is a planet and at liberty to wander about from place to place under the sole condition that it obeys certain rules of motion. When the bright stars that grace the heavens become familiar to observers, they will know just what to expect on each succeeding season.—New York Times.

Customers Too Particular.

Some years ago the proprietors of a so called "ulster house" in London placed in their windows a placard setting forth a new rule of their establishment, namely, that no orders given by Americans would be executed unless the orders were paid for beforehand. The proprietor on being interviewed declared that American ladies were much too hard to please—infinitely more so than English ones. They insisted upon having their things made to fit or they refused to take them. "I had an ulster sent back to me the other day, for instance," he remarked, "by an American customer merely because it was longer in front than it was at the back." Only that and nothing more!—Lucy Hooper in Home Journal.

The Name of Stebbins.

The Stebbins family is fairly numerous. It is not now a classic name. Its owners wear it ignorantly. More the shame for them. It is by right a classic name, borne as it was by the first of Christian martyrs—St. Steven, sometimes spelled Stephen. Steven is the Dutch way of spelling it. Spell it in Spanish—Esteban. Drop the initial silent e and then you have Steban. Among the ignorant the step to Stebbins is very short. And the honorable name of St. Steven takes on degradation, even as the fine old Norman-French name D'Aubaine becomes the homely Dobbins.—Davenport Democrat.

IN REGAL STYLE.

How a Valuable Animal Traveled Four Thousand Miles.

A PALACE CAR FOR AN EQUINE.

A Costly Trotting Stallion From Palo Alto That Received Constant Attendance Day and Night.

When Mr. Bonner bought Sunol out on the Pacific coast at such an enormous figure, there were people who wondered how such an expensive piece of horseflesh was to be safely brought over so many, many miles, and if the price named was payable upon delivery in good condition only. In the case of the baby horse called Arion, which J. Malcolm Forbes, of Massachusetts, purchased for $125,000 from Senator Stanford, the money was paid before the horse took a step out of his stall at Palo Alto. Mr. Forbes' farm is 4,000 miles from Palo Alto, and the transportation from sea to sea was at the risk of the purchaser. Two days after the sale Arion started east in a palace horse car, made the journey in safety and landed at Mr. Forbes' farm feeling the frisky 3-year-old that he was.

Just at the time of the sale it happened that the Palo Alto consignment to the annual sales was ready to start to New York. The private cars stood on the side track to receive them. Arion went with them. He was in perfect winter condition. With no more preparation than the throwing on of a blanket he was led from the stall to the stock chute and thence into the car.

He found quarters there which should have made him ashamed of his old whitewashed home. He was backed into a hardwood stall, open at the top, the sides rising to the height of his back. The rear end and both sides were padded like the corner posts of a prize ring—a bit softer perhaps—and across the open front was placed a restraining bar padded like the stall. His stall was littered with straw, the feed box was swung to the bar under his nose, his head was tied up, a light sheet was thrown upon him and he was ready. Right under his nose his attendant was curled up, and over in the neighboring stall was the colt's hay gauge.

CARE THAT A RACE HORSE RECEIVES.

Baggage for a race horse means blankets of all colors and weights, hoods to match, boots in variety, paints and powders, drinking buckets and mash tubs. A gentlemanly race horse wears no one's clothes, drinks from no one's mug.

Between the farm and the slope of the Sierras Arion munched his hay and talked horse with the attendant. He was "running special," as railroad men say, and was not bothered with switching and sidetracking for the ignoble freight train. The fast freight got out of his way.

When the train started up the Sierra grades and the chill air off the snow capped peaks began to drift into the car, the attendant busied himself and opened the big wooden trunk. He got out a heavy blanket and substituted it for the lighter sheet which Arion was wearing. The doors were closed and the ventilators in the top of the car, similar to those in a passenger coach, were shifted so that no draft of chill air could steal in. Night came on and the lamps were lighted. A hinged bunk was swung down from the wall in front of Arion's stall and the groom turned in.

Arion did not lie down. Horses are never allowed to do that, even on a thirty day sea voyage, and it is the only hardship they suffer. Standing does not hurt them much. They sleep very well with a leanto against the soft padding of the stall.

Arion's journey east was uneventful until he reached Cheyenne, and then he met the surprise of his life. To give relief from the tedium of the journey the horses were to remain in Cheyenne two days. When the train arrived there was a four inch snow on the ground. Bred under sunny California skies, Arion never saw snow. He was led off the car in the early morning.

FIRST EXPERIENCE WITH SNOW.

The moment he caught sight of the white plains glistening in the sun rays he stopped short and looked about him with blank amazement pictured in his big eyes. His groom coaxed him down the decline of the chute, but when he reached the ground he stopped again and blew one of those snorting signals which means distrust. Much coaxing and petting got him down, but he put his feet into the snow as gingerly as a debutante puts her pink toes into the water of Monterey. He was not satisfied until he had trust his muzzle into the snow. He took a deep breath and the frozen mist filled his nostrils. He shook his head with an angry snort and blew the snow up in a tiny cloud. That scared him, and with ears at full cock he backed off.

There was a lot of this sort of maneuvering before he could be persuaded to go along. The race track stables were two miles away and the band was taken there. Every horse was carefully blanketed and the cracks in the stalls were carefully closed. There was one brick stall at the track, and Arion, by right of his record, got that. The weather was bitterly cold, too cold for $125,000 to stand out in, and Arion was invited up town to Banker Hicks' private stable, which is built of brick and heated by steam.

Coming out of his stall the colt struck a yard of ice and slipped. A man on each side threw their shoulders against him and supported him until he secured a footing. The groom was as pale as a ghost when the danger had passed.

In the Hicks stable Arion passed his first night in bed, securing horse snores on a luxurious couch of sweet smelling straw, while outside the door the groom took cat naps and watched the thermometer between times.

DIDN'T LIKE ICE WATER.

The two days in Cheyenne were spent in walking exercise, and in taking the much needed rest for the feet and legs. Once he got used to the snow Arion rather liked it, and when taken out to walk he kept his groom in constant fear lest he should slip and strain himself at play.

J. Malcolm Forbes traveled on the regular passenger trains ahead of his pet.

While at Cheyenne, Arion was called upon by the most prominent citizens of the town. No amount of persuasion could induce him to drink Cheyenne ice water. Finally the groom went into the trunk and brought out a bottle of California claret and mixed it with a bucket of water. Arion sniffed it and sunk his head in up to the eyes. After that there was no trouble about the water.

From Cheyenne to Boston the trip was barren of events. There was another stop midway, and when the sale stock reached New York and were switched into the yards Arion had a few hours' rest with them. Then he resumed his journey attached to a regular passenger train, and reached his New England home sound and well and domiciled in quarters quite as comfortable as those at Palo Alto. California will see him no more.—San Fran-

George K. Holmes, who is officially connected with the National Census Bureau has made a very thorough investigation in regard to mortgages throughout the country. The results of this inquiry are given to the public in an article published in the December number of the "Popular Science Quarterly." He gives an instructive tabular statement of the average distribution of property among twelve and a half million families in the United States. It is estimated that the entire amount of the National wealth is $60,000,000,000. It appears that more than two-thirds of this immense sum is possessed by one-eleventh of the total number of families in this country. A little over one million families own property valued at $43,000,000,000. Such a concentration of wealth must exert a poweful influence over the destination of the American people. The disproportion will be more manifest when it is remembered the average wealth of one and a half million farm-hiring families is only $150. There are five million home-hiring families whose average wealth does not exceed $500. Mr. Holmes is of the opinion that such gigantic inequalities should be in some way checked; and he concludes that "the most effective and practicable remedies are progressive taxes on incomes, gifts and inheritances"

Representative Geary, so we are informed will not support the Wilson bill unless it is amended to suit him. With all due deference to the Representative's opinion, we think this a mistake. A bill cannot be framed to suit every body. In fact, one cannot be framed to suit any one man all the way through. If every man is going to have his particular constituents protected, of course that is the end of tariff legislation. We might as well go in and say that we must forever dicker and trade on tariff lines; that the industries or the interests that have the greatest number of Congressmen, shall draw most from the rest of the people; that the poor must forever, not only support the government while the rich are practically exempt, but must put up and support, through government aid, great corporations and trusts. No man may expect to find a tariff bill that will suit him all the way through, and hence he should support one that is right in principle and in its main features.

The time for the opening of the Midwinter Fair has been set for Saturday, January 27. Arrangements are being made for a grand time. The opening exercises will take place from a grand stand, which is now being erected at a cost of $10,000, and will accommodate 7,000 people. The recreation ground has been chosen for the place, as it will hold 100,000 visitors Director-General De Young will deliver the opening address in behalf of the Exposition. The Orator of the of the day will be W. H. L. Barnes, whose eloquence will do honor to the occasion. Mrs. De Young will probably touch the button that will start the machinery in motion when the great Midwinter Fair will be declared open.

Judge Maguire has introduced a bill to establish a postal telegraph service. We like it. The government ought to own and control the telegraph. The greatest objection is that political secrets could not be so well passed by the "outs." But they could have a cipher. The bill provides for the construction of telegraph lines to every town of 400 inhabitants and to others at the discretion of the Postmaster General. Messages are to have a uniform charge of ten cents for the first ten words and five cents for each additional ten words. Newspapers may have special rates. It seems to be a well considered bill, but it does not seem to provide for the purchase of existing lines, which it should do.

It seems to be impossible to resist the belief that there is but one aim in the minds of our public men—to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. The demonetization of silver by repeal of the Sherman act left 4,000,000 paupers and tramps on the hands of the American people in order that seventy-five thousand millionaires might be pecuniarily benefited. The old saying that "money is as necessary to human life as oxygen" is as true as ever; and by cutting off half the public money, and the most useful half at that, the gold bugs of Wall street, while they may not have been instrumental in precipitating the hard times upon the country, have made their continuance a certainty for some time to come

More Haste, Less Speed.

It was 9 p. m., and Herr August Glimmermann stood ready equipped in traveling costume. He put on his gloves and his hat, snatched up his plaid, turned the gas off and was about to leave the room, preparatory to starting on a long journey through Germany and Italy, when in the dark his sleeve swept over the table, in consequence of which something dropped on the floor, which, to judge from the sound, must have been a coin. Although during his absence no one could enter the room, as he was in the habit of locking it and taking the key with him, yet he thought it better not to leave the money lying about, but secure it in his purse.

He therefore relighted the gas, and found that the coin was only a copper of the value of 1 penny sterling. Putting it in his purse, he hurried out of the room and quickly locked the door, for it was just striking 9, and his train left at 9:18, so that he had only just time to catch it. Eight months later Glimmermann, on his return from Italy, unlocked the door of his room and went in. Ha! what is that? The gas was burning merrily just as he left it after lighting it to seek the dropped coin, he having forgotten to turn it off again in his hurry, and a couple of days later he was presented with a gas bill to the amount of £1 5s. 3½d.

"Hang it," he said, with a sigh, on paying the money, "the old proverb, 'Festina lente,' is not so far wrong after all." —Humoristische Blatter.

Joe Jefferson's Boxing Lesson.

Rising young actors usually guard their positions with a jealous eye, and during the early life of Joseph Jefferson he was no exception to the rule. When under the management of Dion Boucicault, "The Octoroon" was produced, and in the announcement of the papers Jefferson's name did not appear. Being one of the principals in the drama, he naturally felt indignant, and so he sent his part to the theater with a note in which he resigned from his engagement until a new arrangement could be entered into. About this time Jefferson was suffering from dyspepsia and conceived the idea that the gentle exercise of boxing would relieve him. He engaged a professor of the "manly art," and his boxing lessons were given in the drawing room of the house where he was living.

The day following his resignation he and the professor were indulging in a "fierce exchange," when, suddenly looking over his opponent's shoulder, he discovered the amazed faces of Dion Boucicault and William Stuart. They stood aghast at the scene and fancied that Jefferson intended settling his difficulties by an appeal to science and had secured the services of a professional bruiser to assist him. Their alarm was soon set at rest by Jefferson, who dismissed the pugilist and came to a more explicit understanding without the aid of the Marquis of Queensberry.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

"Moon, Ahoy!"

Regarding the seamanship of one of the members of the Massachusetts naval reserve: The incident occurred during the trip on the cruiser San Francisco, and voluminous as was the commendatory report of their doings which was sent to the navy department it did not include this incident.

On the second night that the reserves were at sea one of the amateur tars was on the watch. He was a Boston man. The night was clear and beautiful. Myriads of stars twinkled in the heavens, but there was no moon. Suddenly the reserve sang out:

"Light ahoy!"

"Where away?" asked the officer of the deck.

"Far, far away," replied the would be man-o'-war's man.

When the officer had recovered from the shock occasioned by this unseamanlike answer, he looked over the rail in the direction pointed out by the man from Boston. Then he had another fit. The stern discipline which prevails on a cruiser at sea did not allow him to swear, but there was a word of meaning in the way in which he growled out: "What's the matter with you? Can't you recognize the rising moon when you see it?"

"Moon! Moon!" stammered the embryo sea dog. "I beg your pardon, sir." Then he shouted, as if making amends for his error, "Moon, ahoy!"—Boston Home Journal.

A Balloon Screw.

Some very interesting experiments have been recently made by M. Mallet respecting the action of a screw in producing vertical propulsion in a balloon, the results of which have been presented to the Academy. The screw was designed and set to work by M. Langlois de Saumier. It has a diameter of 7½ feet and turns round a vertical shaft fixed by two clamps to one of the sides of the car. M. Mallet succeeded, by imparting to the screw a velocity of 100 revolutions a minute, in raising the balloon, which has a capacity of 28,000 cubic feet, through a vertical space in the same time of 333 feet.

Frequent repetitions of the same experiment invariably gave the same results. As the screw revolved, it necessarily caused the balloon to rotate also, but the movement was not found to produce any inconvenience, since the velocity did not exceed 0.04 of a complete revolution in a second. The author concluded his communication by a series of observations upon this particular mode of propulsion, pointing out that it was exceedingly well adapted for purposes of scientific experiments.—Genie Civil.

Without Argument.

A young lawyer talked four hours to a jury, who felt like lynching him. His opponent, a grizzled old professional, arose, looked sweetly at the judge and said:

"Your honor, I will follow the example of my young friend who has just finished and submit the case without argument." Then he sat down, and the silence was large and oppressive.—London Tit-Bits.

SOCIETY WOMEN BURGLARS.

A Woman and Her Daughter, Both of Excellent Repute, Arrested For Stealing.

In an Adrian justice court sat two well dressed ladies. Both were comely and apparently refined. The air and dress of the women indicated that they belonged to the upper walks of life and were people of quality. The elder of the two, still below the middle age, sat erect and wore an air of defiance. The other, a young lady of real beauty and tastily attired, was bowed with an air of sorrow.

No one unacquainted with the circumstances would have suspected for a moment that these ladies were a pair of burglars whose work rivals that of some of the best men of the profession. But such was the case. They were mother and daughter—Mrs. Alice Church, a widow of excellent repute, residing in Tecumseh, a village of 2,000, 10 miles from Adrian, and Miss Bessie Church. They were under arrest charged with breaking into the residence of Editor S. C. Stacy of the Tecumseh Herald during the absence of the family and taking therefrom a feather bed, bedclothing, a big job lot of ladies' underwear, several pairs of shoes, a quantity of groceries, etc.

Entrance was effected in the night. Saturday morning the man about the premises noticed that a window had been forced, and investigating he found that the house had been ransacked and the front door key taken. Officers were notified, and as the absence of the key denoted an intended return of the burglars two men were stationed in the house that night. Near 11 o'clock the key softly turned in the lock, and the forms of two persons, apparently men, as they wore men's clothing, appeared. There was a sudden rush, a clasping of the intruders in strong arms and a terrific squabble, embellished with female screams. Astonishment caused one of the officers to let one of the burglars slip, and she fled. The other fought like a tigress and laid about right and left with what proved to be an insect powder spray loaded with cayenne pepper. One of her captors, Abner Wilson, "got it in the eye," but held his girl, and the prisoner was secured. Then she confessed her identity and "gave away" her daughter Bessie as the other burglar. Bessie was followed to her home and arrested.

"What do you plead?" asked the court as he took off his glasses after receiving the information. "We waive examination, sir," was the firm, clear and businesslike response of the elder prisoner. "I will make your bonds $500 each," rejoined the court. "Your honor, that is too high; it is excessive," again spoke the elder lady. "I must make it $500," said the court. "Very well, sir, but it is too high; I cannot get it; we must go to jail." The prisoners then signified to the officer that they were ready, and the rustle of the silk skirts of the burglars was heard moving down the stairs. They are in jail awaiting trial.

The affair is the greatest surprise and sensation Tecumseh has had in many a day, and society experiences a tremendous shock.—Chicago Tribune.

"REAL LONDON SOCIETY."

It Contains Two Classes Whose Rights to Be So Identified Differ Radically.

A London correspondent in a recent letter to a New York paper says: We have been told this week by Lady Charles Beresford that the real London society, which includes "those who are there by right, and whom nothing can remove as long as their fortunes survive," consists of only 30 or 40 families. So called London society, she declares, includes two classes, one of them being those who are there, not of right, but by force, and who remain by dint of labor, thinking no cost too excessive to pay for the privilege of meeting with the great. The other section consists of those who are still anxious to obtain admittance into what appears to them to be a social paradise, and who still hope, and have every right to hope, to succeed, despite all the ridicule lavished upon them.

On the delicate and much-vexed question of the morals of society, Lady Beresford says that the real question is whether the circle in which immorality is so openly practiced is widening. She thinks it is not. It is generally noticed, she says, that the most pronounced set has, for some time, found it difficult to gather fresh recruits.

Negroes Who Pass For Whites.

At the census of 1880 nearly 34 per cent of the colored population was under 10 years of age, while at the census of 1890 only 28 per cent was under 10 years of age. Samuel E. Tatum, a Washington negro, in explaining this, says: "It may be a fact that the colored population is constantly falling off in its increase, for which there may be a great many reasons. We should first take into consideration the vast number of people of color leaving the race yearly. There are thousands who emigrate from the south so light in complexion that in the north they are supposed to be white, and in this way a vast number of families in the course of a decade lose their identity as people of color."—Washington Special.

Exhibited the Remains.

In Philadelphia the other day there was a striking evidence of the intense desire of some people to "exhibit the remains" at funerals. A man had died of diphtheria, and the authorities very properly refused to permit a public funeral. So the family had the coffin containing the corpse stood on end in front of a window of the house, so that the face of the dead could be viewed from the street. —Philadelphia Letter.

Sunflower Newspapers.

The paper mill at this place has made from sunflower stalks several tons of paper which will be sent to experts in the east. The paper is regarded as superior to straw paper. The mill is now buying sunflowers. Last evening The Daily Republican ran its entire edition on the sunflower paper. — Salina (Kan.) Dispatch.

Ordinance No. 50.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every male person over twenty-one and under fifty five years of age, found in each Road District of the County of Inyo, State of California, between the first day of March, 1894, and the thirty first day of December, 1894, excepting all persons who were honorably discharged from service in the army or navy of the United States, at any time between the first day of April, in the year A. D. 1861, and the first day of September, A. D. 1865, and who have not paid the same in some other road district, must pay to the said County of Inyo, a road poll tax of two dollars.

SECTION 2. Said road poll tax shall be collected by the Assessor of the said County of Inyo, in the same manner that State Poll Taxes are collected, and shall be paid to the Treasurer of the said County of Inyo and shall be placed to the credit of the several road districts of the said County of Inyo from which said road poll tax was collected.

SECTION 3. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and Ordinance No. 46 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 9th day of January, 1893 is hereby repealed, and all ordinances and parts of Ordinances of said Board in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

SECTION 4. This Ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said County of Inyo, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

Ordinance No. 51.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep in the County of Inyo, State of California, must annually procure a license therefor from the Tax-Collector of said Inyo County, and must make therefor the following payment:

1. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five thousand sheep or more shall constitute the first class, and must pay Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars per annum for the first five thousand sheep, and for every additional thousand sheep the sum of Fifty Dollars per annum.

2. Those owning and having in their possession and under their control four thousand sheep and less than five thousand constitute the second class, and must pay Two Hundred Dollars per annum.

3. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand five hundred sheep and less than four thousand constitute the third class and must pay One Hundred and seventy-five Dollars per annum.

4. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand sheep and less than three thousand five hundred constitute the fourth class and must pay One Hundred and fifty Dollars per annum.

5. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand five hundred sheep and less than three thousand constitute the fifth class and must pay One Hundred and twenty-five Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand sheep and less than two thousand five hundred constitute the sixth class and must pay One Hundred Dollars per annum.

7 Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand five hundred sheep and less than two thousand constitute the seventh class and must pay Seventy-five Dollars per annum.

8. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand sheep and less than one thousand five hundred constitute the eighth class, and must pay Fifty Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five hundred sheep and less than one thousand constitute the ninth class and must pay Twenty-five dollars per annum.

10. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control a less number than five hundred sheep constitute the tenth class, and must pay Twelve Dollars and fifty cents per annum.

SECTION 2. The license provided for by this ordinance shall be deemed a debt due the said County of Inyo, and the Tax-Collector of the said Inyo County shall have the collection of said license, and it is hereby made his duty to collect the same, and any person required to take out a license under the provisions of this ordinance, who fails or neglects, or refuses to take out such license, the said Tax-Collector may direct suit to be brought in the name of the County of Inyo as plaintiff, for the recovery of said license and in such case either the Tax Collector or the attorney for the said plaintiff in said suit may make the necessary affidavit for, and a writ of attachment may issue without any bond being given on behalf of the plaintiff, and in case of recovery by the said plaintiff, fifty dollars damages must be added to the judgment and costs, to be collected from the defendant.

SECTION 3. The County Auditor of said Inyo County shall prepare and have printed, suitable blank licenses for the said Tax Collector to carry out the provisions of this ordinance, with a blank receipt attached, for the signature of the Tax-Collector, when sold.

SECTION 4. The said Tax Collector shall collector a fee of one dollar for each license sold which shall be paid into the Salary fund of the said Inyo County.

SECTION 5 All moneys collected for licenses under the provisions of this ordinance shall be paid over to the County Treasurer of said Inyo County as other moneys, and shall be placed to the credit of the Salary fund of said County.

SECTION 6. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty five days from its passage, and ordinance No. 41 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 7th day of January, 1892, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances or parts of ordinances of said Board, in conflict herewith, are each and all of them hereby repealed.

SECTION 7. This ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said Inyo County, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

SATURDAY, Jan. 13, 1894.

Frederike Rhine vs. James McCarty—Filed Clerk's entry of default.

Bar silver, 69¾.

Jerry Mairs has gone to the Midwinter Fair.

J. R. Moffett was up from Lone Pine Wednesday.

A. B. Hogan returned to Los Angeles on last Monday's stage.

District Attorney Forbes spent the week at Bishop on official business.

Dan Tressil came down from Big Pine Wednesday, returning yesterday.

L. F. J. Wrinkle went north on last Saturday's train on his way to Pine Grove.

Saturday, January 27th has been set as the day on which to open the Midwinter Fair.

The trials of Islay, Hughes, Jones and Payne have been postponed to a day not yet fixed.

A mild form of measles is prevalent in this vicinity. No severe cases have been reported.

Don't forget the sheet and pillow-case party at Mairs' Hall this evening. Lots of fun at a nominal cost.

Mrs. J. E. Dunlap of Bishop has been visiting with relatives and friends at Independence for the past couple of weeks.

Regular meeting of Inyo Lodge No. 221, to-morrow evening. Officers will also be installed to serve for the ensuing Masonic year.

A very extensive acreage of new ground will be broken in the neighborhood of Bishop this year and seeded to alfalfa and other crops.

Chas. Barclay of Bodie came down to Independence on Monday last and spent the week in town. He expects to go to Benton to-morrow.

Mr. and Mrs. John Shepherd expect to start for Modock to-day on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Gunn. Mrs. J. C. Irwin accompanied them.

A. J. Davis has so far recovered from his recent illness as to be able to work again. He will give prompt attention to boot and shoe repairing and other work in his line.

J. F. Robinson came up to Independence yesterday from Keeler. Mr. Robinson has been mining in Arizona for many years and has now concluded to try his luck in Inyo.

Herb Hartshorn has closed the Bishop Creek Hotel and has gone to ranching. Herb. was in the hotel business in this valley about fifteen years and was ever an obliging and genial host.

J. J. Morton arrived at Keeler on Wednesday from Madera, and came up to Independence yesterday morning. He is attending to business connected with the estate of John Morton, deceased.

A party of nimrods, consisting of Ed. Yerington, George Mills, Abe Cohen and George Bryson, passed south last Thursday. They were on their way to Big Pine, where quail are plentiful.—Bulletin.

Dr. and Mrs. J. S. McQueen came down from Bishop on Monday last and are at the Norman House. Dr. McQueen has brought all necessary appliances and is prepared to do all kinds of dental work.

A special train went down to Keeler on Monday, returning Tuesday morning, having on board President H. M. Yerington and Mrs. Yerington, Assistant Supt. R. J. Laws and Governor R. K. Colcord and wife.

Supervisor Wilson has put the road from the Alabama Hills to Lone Pine in a splendid condition. Rocks have been removed, grading and ditching done, and that stretch of highway is now a "bird."

Why will men persist in the vice of lying, apparently just for the sake of it? In the Index this week over the signature of "William Thomas" is published one of the commonest kind of lies. It does not possess literary merit, nor is it even original. It is a paraphrase of a story published some time since, purporting to be a history of a similar find in Nevada. It is simply an unimaginative, every day, common place lie.

Fostering Sectional Feeling.

Last week's issue of the Bishop Register contains an article which we did not suppose even the editor of that narrow-minded joural, with all his natural and acquired stupidity, would be guilty of publishing. In it he finds fault with a certain lengthy article in the Los Angeles Herald, advertising Owens Valley. Instead of expressing a grateful acknowledgment of the favor conferred, the editor of the Register, with contemptible meanness, finds fault with a most valuable advertisement that did not cost him or the people of Owens Valley one cent. Furthermore, the Register is false in its statements. We are charitable enough to attribute this blunder to addle headed stupidity, not wilful and malicious lying. It says that Bishop has not received due recognition in the vatious descriptions of Owens Valley that have been written by certain Independence people. As all, or nearly all, of the articles descriptive of Inyo County published in the Los Angeles papers were written by C. Mulholland, the reference in the Register applies directly to him. A glance at an extensive pamphlet written by Mr. Mulholland in April last is sufficient to refute the senseless charge made by the Register. It gives the town of Bishop and surrounding locality the recognition it justly deserves. This pamphlet did not cost the editor of the Register, the people of Bishop nor Inyo County a cent; and the object it had in view, that of attracting settlers to the Valley, is already being fulfilled. A pamphlet written by Mr. Mulholland a number of years ago, also published free of cost to any citizen of this county, gave a full description of Bishop and vicinity, and was the means of the expenditure of upwards of one hundred thousand dollars at and around the town of Bishop by the Hillside Company alone. Mr. Mulholland has also written many articles for this paper, which were entirely devoted to Bishop and the neighboring region. Had the people of Inyo County been called upon to pay for the article in the Herald, it would have cost them at least two hundred dollars, that being the rate charged for similar articles occupying like space. We humbly apologize, a thing by the way, we are not in the habit of doing, for giving so much space to so small a thing as the editor of the Register and his wretchedly low and petty meanness in endeavoring to foster sectional jealousy and create a feeling of prejudice against a man whose constant aim and endeavor it has been for years past to bring Inyo County to the notice of the outside world and induce capital to develop her rich and boundless resources; who has spent his time and money and has received no assistance, save in a solitary instance. Should his efforts prove successful, every citizen of Inyo County would be benefited thereby; and the editor of the Register, instead of seeking to create a feeling against him, should regard it as a duty to aid and assist him in his endeavor.

A Thriving Section.

There is constant and rapid improvement being made in the country surrounding Bishop, particularly in the Warm Spring District, east and south from that place. That entire section is now being made into homes, and what was a desert waste a few years ago, is now being brought under cultivation. Orchards have been and are being planted, a large acreage of ground is now bearing alfalfa, and a much larger area will be seeded this year. Several parties are now at work extending and widening the Andy Dell ditch, and when it is completed an extensive territory will be rendered available for agricultuaal purposes.

His Requirements.

Jim Townsend of the Lundy Index says: "We would like to have some heavy metropolitan editor take charge of the Index while we go to the Fair, just to see how he would rack his brain in this altitudinous wilderness. He must be able to set type without copy, maul a hand-press, shovel snow and be a master of the buck-saw, besides being an all-round kitchen-swamper and pot-walloper; and, above all, he must have the moral stamina to decline frequent invitations to drink.

William Mitchell was married at Oleander, Fresno county, on December 28th to Miss Frazier. The wedding was quite an affair, a full description of which was given in the Fresno Expositor. There were many guests present, and the bride received many valuable gifts. The happy couple are enjoying their honeymoon at the Midwinter Fair.

The Meads Bros. got in from Mojave on Wednesday with their big team loaded with freight, most of it for Bishop. There was more freight awaiting them in Mojave than they could haul. Wm. Arcularius arrived the same day with a 16 mule team loaded with freight mostly for Ruine's.

A. R. Jones, J. D. Jones and Jack Bryson are mining at Cottonwood. They have a ledge about a foot wide of free milling gold ore, averaging about $40 per ton. They are taking out about a ton of ore a day, which they will work in arastras.

Attention is directed to the advertisement of Henry Eaton & Co., fruit, produce and commission dealers, San Francisco, Cal. The firm solicits correspondence from those having anything in their line to sell.

Mrs. M. E. Curtis has leased the Bell ranch at Big Pine, and is prepared to do stylish dressmaking at low prices.

A LOVE MISSIVE.

O beauty, kindness, purity,
Are Woman's noblest dower;
Rose sweet, and even so fair is she—
Heav'n's star, earth's loveliest flower!
But though no share in these you claim—
You, who my heart possess—
I vow to love you all the same,
And love you none the less.
For I will love you for love's sweet sake,
That can this world transform—
A garden in the desert make,
A stillness 'midst the storm;
That, with one touch, old bonds can break,
And for old wrongs atone,
Then let me love for love's sweet sake,
And love's sweet sake alone!

—George Douglas in Academy.

Water from a Growing Vine.

The explorer Coudreau found awhile ago while wandering among the Tumac-Humac mountains, in the western part of Guiana, that it was not necessary for his men to descend to a creek when they wanted a drink of water. A vine known as the water vine is found all through that region. It yields an abundant supply of excellent drinking fluid whenever it is called upon. This vine grows to a height of sixty to ninety feet. It is usually about as thick as the upper part of the human arm. It winds itself loosely around trees, clambers up to their summits and then falls down perpendicularly to the ground, where it takes root again.

The natives cut this vine off at the ground and then, at a height of about six or seven feet, they cut it again, which leaves in their hands a very stout piece of wood a little longer than themselves. In order to obtain its sap they raise the lower end of the vine upon some support and apply the upper end to their mouths. The section of the vine, while showing a smooth, apparently compact surface, is pierced with many little veins, through which the sap flows freely. Six feet of the vine gives about a pint of water, which is slightly sweet to the taste. Coudreau says that it quenches thirst as effectively as water from the most refreshing brook.—New York Sun.

A Reason for Everything.

The author of "Across England in a Dog Cart" once stopped to examine a church in the little village of Enstone.

The day was warm, and on leaving the church I rested for awhile in the grateful shade of the building, and for the sake of the coolness still kept my hat in my hand. While standing there I overheard one workman ask of another:

"Why do 'e keep 'is 'at off like that out of doors mate?"

"'Cause he's a Quaker, o' course," replied the mate. "Quakers allus do in churchyards."

Here was an opportunity not to be lost. "No," said I, "I am not a Quaker. I'm an Episcopalian."

There was a short awkward pause. Then the first workman evidently of an inquiring turn of mind, said to his fellow mason, who seemed to be considered an authority:

"A E-piscopale one, 'e says 'e is. Wot's that, Bill?"

"Oh," replied the learned Bill, quite equal to the occasion, "that's one of them fancy foreign religions, sure!"

When Woman's Work Was Valuable.

In early Bible days richly embroidered raiment was enumerated with the gold, silver and other valuable property of a rich man. In that primitive age Dame Fashion was not the fickle goddess she is at present, and the "raiment" so frequently mentioned in the Holy Scriptures descended from father to son as a valuable part of the inheritance. Raiment was often sent, with gold and gems as a present to dignitaries.

It took, not months, but years to ornament some of these garments, and the gold thread so lavishly used in embroidering them was real gold. Moses describes the process of making the gold thread that was used in ornamenting the tabernacle. The habit of making presents of rare needlework is still common among eastern nations who changed their customs so slowly.—Woman's Work.

The flags to be hoisted at one time in signaling at sea never exceed four. It is an interesting arithmetical fact that with 18 variously colored flags, and never more than four at a time, no fewer than 78,642 signals can be given.

The world annually consumes about 650,000 tons of coffee. Estimating coffee as being worth about $400 per ton, which is about a good average, this represents an outlay of $260,000,000 for this one beverage each year.

The longest single telegraph wire span in the world is that across the River Kistnah, between Bezorah and Sectamazon, India. Stretched from one mountain to another, the wire is more than 6,000 feet in length.

CHAPTER I.

"I am Miss Margaret Woolstine."

The newspaper which Reuben Hale and I own and edit is, I am aware, a "one horse" affair, but we are satisfied with it. It is a small eight paged weekly, largely made up of advertisements and scissorings, and the subscription price is one dollar a year. We have no reporters; we never print telegrams nor murders, and we have a subscription list of 172,000 names—farmers, gardeners and country people, because wherever there are people raising fruit, truck or flowers there goes the little Seed and Graft, and we are old fogy enough to employ girls to fold and direct these newspapers, and these girls do their work cheerfully and seem to be happy. When one of them marries we give her a sewing machine and a dining room table.

One day I came into the office after an absence of a couple of hours, and found Hale scissoring the New York dailies.

"Dan," said he, "there was a young woman in here to see you."

"Very well," said I getting a glass of water, "you saw her, I suppose? It is as hot as ginger outside, Reuben."

"I saw her," he replied, "but she didn't want to see me. It was the old gentleman she was after."

"Now, come," said I, sitting down, "I 'am not going to shirk the title, but you'll have to take shares in it. You can't be distinguished from me by it, my boy! I am gray, but you are bald; I am lean and you are stout, and there isn't a six months difference in our years or our looks, Reuben Hale."

"Have it as you please," said he, "but that is what she said—she wanted to see old Mr. Crawford. I think she thought me the young one."

"Was she a blind young woman?"

"Blind!" he repeated. "Just wait until you see her eyes. Oh, she is coming back! At 2 o'clock, Daniel. Even if she didn't want to see me I asked her to do that. I told her you'd be sure to be in then."

"Well, I won't," I answered. "I am going out to Melvin on the 1:45. I am not going to stay in town this sweltering afternoon."

"Yes, you are. You'll thank your happy stars if you do. If you miss her, Daniel, you'll break her heart, and after you have seen her she'll break yours."

"I am going on the 1:45 train," I repeated.

"Bet you a dollar you don't," said Hale. "I told her to come at 2, but she said 1 o'clock would be more convenient, and she would try to find you then, and Daniel, you had better take your feet off the chair, and brush that hair of yours up a little, for here she comes. I hear the echo of her voice and the patter of her heels in the out office, where she has just asked Marvey if you are in."

"What a dunce you are! I really think"— But at that moment the door opened, and Marvey appeared.

"Lady to see Mr. Crawford," said he, stepping aside, and there entered a young woman dressed very plainly in dark blue, with a smoke colored veil pretty well covering her face.

"You do not remember me, Mr. Crawford," she said. "I am Miss Margaret Woolstine. I see you very often in church, but of course you do not see me, but you have to"— and she nervously laughed, "you have to hear me, you know."

"Mr. Crawford," said Reuben, getting up without the glimmer of a smile and with great deliberation, "I am going to Melvin on the 1:45, and I shall have to leave at once. Will you kindly pay that dollar for me on account?" He put on his hat, took his cane, bowed to Miss Woolstine, went out the door, and I heard him immediately tramping upstairs to the composing room, where I knew he had proofs to read. There were times when Reuben Hale was 16 years of age instead of 60.

Miss Woolstine looked more comfortable after we were alone, and she took off her veil, holding it in her hands.

"I almost felt as if I knew you, Mr. Crawford," she said. "When I was a little girl I used to sit with my uncle in his pew just where I could see you as I looked at the painted glass window, and now from the choir of course we have you in full view."

"And you do not think me rude because you so often catch me watching you?"

The girl slightly colored. "You have the kindest face in all the church. I could never think you rude." And with that she became scarlet.

"I will not say what I think of yours," I said gently, "or you might think me very rude indeed, but can I do anything for you?"

She crushed her veil tightly in her hands. "I do not want to take up your time, Mr. Crawford; but I do want to talk to you a minute. I have to support myself, and I want to get newspaper work, Mr. Crawford, and I thought perhaps you would give me some. It is so quiet here."

I looked at her with surprise. "I thought you lived with your uncle, Mr. Mason?"

"I did, but we do not agree, and I have no money of my own, and as I have to leave there I must support myself."

"But surely your natural resource would be in music, Miss Woolstine. Your voice ought to be worth a great deal to you."

"I could not sing in public," she quickly answered. "The church I do not mind, because I have gone there all my life, but the concert stage!—oh, I could not do that! And I would rather not teach. It worries me to teach music."

"You would make a success in concerts." She shook her head. "And," I continued, "it would be far more lucrative than any work I could give you. You would not like a position here at all. The girls are good, respectable girls, but they would not suit you at all. And the wages is low."

"I have my salary in the church," she said; "that would help a little, and I do not want a situation with your girls, Mr. Crawford; I want editorial work."

"Ho, ho, editorial work!" I smiled at this; "but you know Mr. Hale and I do all that and have time to spare."

"But I have helped you a little," she explained with eagerness. "I have written you several things and you have always published them. Last week you made an editorial of one."

"So, indeed! Then you are 'Mark Willis?'" and I nodded my head like a Chinese mandarin, I have since been informed. "Well, you are not only a very beautiful young lady, but you are a clever one, too. I don't know that we ought to refuse Mr. Mark Willis!"

"Oh, please do not," she cried. "I should be so glad to come here, and I think I could soon learn to be useful. I could cut out paragraphs for you, and that must be such stupid work for you to do; and I could write on what subjects you thought best, and if you or the other gentleman wanted to go away for a few days I am sure I could do different things for you. And," she added, "you might both want to go away together. Suppose today you also would have liked to have left town on the 1:45 train. Wouldn't you have been more comfortable to have known some one was here ready to receive messages or attend to your orders?"

At this how could I help smiling, and I told her that her reasoning almost convinced me. "Indeed," I added, "it would do so but for two reasons—one, we do not need you in the slightest, and the other is that this stuffy office is no place for a young lady."

She stood up and I could see tried to look entirely indifferent, but her lips trembled and her face paled.

"Of course then," she answered me, "there is nothing more to be said, and I can only beg your pardon, Mr. Crawford, for having troubled you."

As I sat still looking at her it flashed upon me that perhaps if I knew more of the history of this girl I should not so hastily shut the door upon her. And I have a very strong feeling about disappointing women. When I married my wife and I had only a meager salary upon which to live, and I grumbled enough because I had to work all night, and in consequence slept nearly all day. I thought I was deprived of my share of sunlight and social life, and my wife tenderly agreed with me.

After she suddenly failed in health and died I discovered that she had worked in our little house all day and sewed for the shops at night! It was thus she bought my little comforts! And now that she was dead and could not share the comfort and repose of my life it seemed to me that because of her deprivations I ought to be more thoughtful of other women. Little enough did the girls guess how often they owed some little pleasure or indulgence to the mute pleading of my wife's memory. Thinking thus, I said:

"Are you quite determined on newspaper work, Miss Woolstine?"

"Quite. And perhaps I should tell you that I have an offer which I can accept from The Royal Express, although I have not written for them, but I have just come from there and they seem desirous of trying me."

"Do you want to go there?"

She flushed painfully. "No, I do not. It is so public. There are so many men going and coming."

I rubbed my hands nervously.

"Sit down, Miss Woolstine; who did you see there—at the office?"

"Mr. Finley, the editor."

"And you will go there?"

"I think I ought at least to try it, don't you? It is one of our best papers."

I have not described Margaret Woolstine, and I do not know how to do so. She was a lovely creature, tall, slender, with a superb carriage of the head and the most charming coloring. Her eyes were dark and tender, but pride and obstinacy curved her pretty mouth, and I often thought that it could not be pleasant to cross her will. But thus far I have never had to do more than observe what has happened to others who tried to subdue and conquer her.

As she stood before me, so young and charming and innocent, I thought of my wife, who was also a Margaret, and I knew she would not have allowed the child to go into such a crowd as frequented The Royal Express, and I said:

"Have you no mother?"

"I have only my uncle," she answered, "and he is angry with me. My mother and father are dead."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

The Straight Way Was Good Enough.

She walked up to the fan counter of a large store, rustling in silk petticoat and gorgeous in russet shoes and chamois gloves.

"Have you," she began in a loud but not absolutely certain voice, "have you—er—any of those derseeacyle fans?"

"Any what?" inquired the clerk in amazement.

"Oh," said the young person loftily, "they're generally called fans derseeacycle, but the straight way seemed good enough for me."

When even this information failed to throw any light on the subject, she walked out again, saying that she'd look elsewhere where the clerks knew something. Such are the ways of the fin de siecle young person.—Omaha Bee.

The Wrong Man.

Bret Harte is so frequently complimented as the author of "Little Breeches" that he is almost as sorry it was ever written as is Colonel John Hay, who would prefer his fame to rest on more ambitious work. A gushing lady, who prided herself upon her literary tastes, said to him once: "My dear Mr. Harte, I am so delighted to meet you. I have read everything you ever wrote, but of all your dialect verse there is none that compares to your 'Little Breeches.'" "I quite agree with you, madam," said Mr. Harte, "but you have put the little breeches on the wrong man."—Argonaut.

How He Did It.

"I have a sure way of getting mosquitoes out of a room," said the melancholy man at the seaside boarding house.

"How do you do it?" asked several people at once.

"I go out of doors myself," he replied.—Washington Star.

Getting Too Serious.

"Oh, yes. Why, he has got so he can borrow $5 or $10 at a time."—Life.

Made Up.

She made up her frizzes with irons,
She made up her face with chalk;
You'd never suppose
That her lips of rose,
Whenever she'd smile or talk,
Were colored with scarlet tinting,
Or her blushes were purchased pink,
Or this beautiful girl's
White teeth were pearls
She could take out as quick as wink.
She made up her neck and shoulders
(They were both of them kalsomined),
And one day when Fred
Asked if they should wed
She easily made up her mind!

TO STOP THE PROGRESS of Consumption, you will find but one guaranteed remedy—Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. In advanced cases, it brings comfort and relief; if you haven't delayed too long, it will certainly cure. It doesn't claim too much. It won't make new lungs—nothing can; but it will make diseased ones sound and healthy, when everything else has failed.

The scrofulous affection of the lungs that's caused Consumption, like every other form of Scrofula, and every blood taint and disorder, yields to the "Discovery." It is the most effective blood-cleanser, strength-restorer, and flesh-builder that's known to medical science. In all Bronchial, Throat, and Lung Affections, if it ever fails to benefit or cure, you have your money back.

A HERALD OF THE INFANT YEAR.

Clip the last thirty years or more from the century, and the segment will represent the term of the unbounded popularity of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The opening of the year 1894 will be signalized by the appearance of a fresh Almanac of the Bitters, in which the uses, derivation and action of this world-famous medicine will be lucidly set forth. Everybody should read it. The calendar and astronomical calculations to be found in this brochure are always astonishingly accurate, and the statistics, illustrations, humor and other reading matter rich in interest and full of profit. The Hostetter Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., publish it themselves. They employ more than sixty hands in the mechanical work, and more than eleven months in the year are consumed in its preparation. It can be obtained, without cost, of all druggists and country dealers, and is printed in English, German, French, Welsh, Norwegian, Swedish, Holland, Bohemian and Spanish.

"Gol-lee!" said Tommy as he sat down at the Thanksgiving table and viewed the spread, "I wisht I was the injy-rubber man."

CATARRH CANNOT BE CURED

with LOCAL APPLICATIONS, as they cannot reach the seat of the disease. Catarrh is a blood or constitutional disease, and in order to cure it you must take internal remedies. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, and acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces. Hall's Catarrh Cure is not a quack medicine. It was prescribed by one of the best physicians in this country for years, and is a regular prescription. It is composed of the best tonics known, combined with the best blood purifiers, acting directly on the mucous surfaces. The perfect combination of the two ingredients is what produces such wonderful results in curing Catarrh. Send for testimonials, free.

TRUE TO THE LAST.

A man said unto his angel:
"My spirits are fallen through,
And I cannot carry this battle;
Oh, brother, what shall I do?

"The terrible kings are on me
With spears that are deadly bright;
Against me so from the cradle
Do fate and my fathers fight?"

Then said to the man his angel:
"Thou wavering, foolish soul,
Back to the ranks! What matter
To win or to lose the whole?

"Adjudged by the little judges
Who hearken not well, nor see;
Not thus, by the outer issue,
The wise shall interpret thee.

"Thy will is the very, the only,
The solemn event of things;
The weakest of hearts defying,
Is stronger than all these kings.

"Though out of the paths they gather,
Mind's Doubt and Bodily Pain,
And pallid Thirst of the Spirit
That is kin to the other twain.

"And Grief, in a cloud of banners,
And ringleted Vain Desires,
And Vice, with the spoils upon him,
Of thee and thy beaten sires.

"What hands soever have armed them
Toward victory still to ride,
A meaning left to the rebel,
A use to the regicide.

"So bitter and large a meaning,
A vehement use so true,
One steady intent to scorn them
Doth scorn them and slay them too!

"While kings of eternal evil
Yet darken the hills about,
Thy part is with broken saber
To rise on the last redoubt.

"To fear not sensible failure,
Nor covet the game at all,
But fighting, fighting, fighting,
Die, driven against the wall!"
—Louise Imogen Guiney in Boston Pilot.

A WICKLOW STORY.

Many years ago two beings dwelt in the valley of Glendalough—i. e., the valley of the two lakes. One was in his sixteenth summer. The other had scarcely seen her thirteenth spring. They were the children of two well to do peasants, neighbors in that peaceful valley, and their young lives had hitherto passed a way as dreamily as the sound of the waterfall beside their doors. They were ever together. Their parents looked on their intimacy and smiled. And day by day as they wandered out into the fields to gather flowers, threading the mazy pathways of the woods or scaling, like young mountain chamois, the giddy cliffs around, they became more woven into each other's being until, even in their early youth, they were like two tendrils—intertwined with each other.

And so Joseph and Agnes grew up. One morning in the latter part of autumn they met at the old spring under the hillside, and set out to gather wild flowers for the coming festival—for the valley in those days was not so sparse of vegetation as it is today. The day was bright with autumn glory. All down the valley and high up over the blue face of heaven was a glow like that which prophets tell us hangs over the golden landscape of paradise. Leaf, tree and lake were steeped in effulgence, while the wind murmured low and tremulously.

"Let us go to Lugnaquilla," said Joseph. "for there are the choicest flowers, and the day is so beautiful we can go and return before nightfall."

Lugnaquilla is the highest mountain in Wicklow. Agnes hesitated a moment, and then said, "We shall lose sight of the mountain as soon as we enter the woods, but I know the way, let us go!" and hand in hand they wended their way. So full of thoughtless happiness were they that they had wandered from flower to flower until the sun was at the noon, without remembering that they ought long since to have been at the mountain of Lugnaquilla. All at once, however, in the midst of their mirth, this reflection came across them like a dark shadow on the bosom of some sunny lake.

They paused involuntarily, and Agnes, gazing up into Joseph's face with a look of mingled inquiry and alarm, said, "Joseph, where are we, and where is the mountain of Lugnaquilla?"

"I surely don't know the way," answered the boy, "and this seems like and yet unlike it. Ah! here is the road—no, it cannot be"—and he paused, bewildered.

"We are not lost, are we, Joseph?" said the maiden in trembling tones, drawing closer to her companion's side.

"Surely, we are not lost on the mountain? Oh, no!" answered the boy, cheering his companion, though his heart echoed not back his words. "I have only missed the way a little and will soon find it again. Rest awhile, Agnes, while I climb this tree to look out for the bluff brow of the Lugnaquilla."

But, alas! it was nowhere to be seen. With alarm he beheld nothing, on every hand around, but rugged hills—and here and there a valley opened out before him, but it was strange to the boy's eyes and there was no familiar feature in all that wild landscape.

It were a long story to relate how these two young beings wandered on from high noon until almost twilight, threading tangled forests, crossing mountain streams and scaling the rugged precipices crossing their path, in the vain hope of reaching the valley from which they had set out. Joseph never desponded, and if Agnes burst into tears at new disappointments he would cheer her with new hopes, until she grew ashamed to weep and smiled again as sweetly as ever. Mile after mile was thus left behind, yet they saw no signs around them of human life. All was wild, solitary, sublime. As night drew on the heart of Joseph began to despond, though he still strove to smile on Agnes.

"Oh, Joseph, it is not fear," she said tearfully, "that I feel; for are you not near me? But it is that my mother and yours, too, Joseph, will think all night that we are dead."

Meantime the twilight had darkened around them, and the wind, which had been shifting all around the horizon during the afternoon, came out at length from the bleak north. Often in those upper regions the day that opens with a summer's warmth will set in at sunset with the frost of December. Poor Agnes had been brought up with tender nurture, and now, when the storm came on in its fury, pelting fiercely on her unsheltered form, though Joseph covered her tenderly as he would a dove in his own mantle, yet even that could not keep out the keen breath of the tempest. Alas! for the unfriended situation of those two innocent young beings, alone in the forest, with night setting in and no covering for their heads but the tempestuous heavens.

Well might Agnes cling closer to Joseph as the storm howled fiercer overhead—and well might the tears gush unbidden even into his eyes as he thought of the frail being whose life he had imperiled, and yet, to save her, he would have laid down his own existence. But the storm waxed louder and louder, and the cold breeze became intense, as when it freezes the lakes in a single breath of the hurricane. Their frail clothing could not keep out the biting blast that the next moment froze upon their garments. They felt that drowsiness was stealing upon them, and yet they knew that it was death; they sat half sheltered against a tree, fast losing all recollection. Awhile they murmured of their lost way, of home, of heaven, and then there was a silence. Suddenly a light flashed over Joseph's fast dimming memory, that to sleep thus was to sleep forever; and rousing himself he approached Agnes and conjured her to awake.

"Agnes, dear Agnes," said he, "wake; lie not motionless, dear Agnes. Awake! awake!"

"Joseph, I am very cold," she said, as she revived at his plaintive ejaculation. "Let me sleep."

"But, Agnes, you must not sleep," said Joseph wildly.

But she only smiled. His words were in vain. Her mind was wandering in dreams. With agony of heart Joseph at length gave over in despair, and wrapping his mantle closer around Agnes, threw himself down under a tree and resolved to share the same fate as the girl whose life was fast ebbing away.

* * * * * * *

Far away in their happy homes the light still burned in the window for their beacon, and their mothers sat, broken hearted, weeping for them as for the dead.

And their fathers—where were they? Out on the hillside in the storm searching for their lost ones, hunting every well known resort, and under the precipices and in the streams, assisted by their neighbors, with torches flashing out across the darkness, and their warning halloos ringing far and clear along the night. For an hour they maintained their search, until they reached the stream whence Joseph and Agnes had set out for Lugnaquilla. There they paused, bewildered and uncertain where to proceed. Every nook and dell and cliff around had been ransacked in vain, and now, as they stood there in the torchlight, despair was seen on each countenance.

But did we say all despaired? No. One still hoped—the pastor of the flock; for he, too, gray haired though he was, had turned out into the pelting storm; and now he stood there in the midst of the seekers, and, baring his white locks to the icy wind, called on all to join him in a prayer that the loved ones might yet be rescued from death and restored to their parents, and even as he closed a smile of hope and holy faith played on his face as if it were the face of an apostle, and just then, too, a favorite dog of Agnes', which had seemed forgotten hitherto, sprang from the group and, with nose upon the ground, ran barking wildly away up the hillside.

"My children," said the old priest, "God hath already answered our prayers and sent this dumb animal to lead us on our way. See! he hath found the path the dear ones took. Fear not. Let us follow."

And they followed as he led. And on they went, mile after mile, up hillside and around the mountain, and then down into the valley and up the hillside once more, and away and away, until the chill air made even some of those strong men shiver. Yet never for a moment did the faithful hound swerve from his way, nor did his followers falter or doubt, but on they kept, until the storm had almost subsided and full two hours' time had passed since they set forth on their search. At length, with a loud cry of joy, the dog dashed madly forward, and that eager band, old and young, together hurrying on, beheld at a sudden turn the two dear ones they sought lying side by side in the half sheltered nook, shrouded in the icy garments they had wrapped around them ere they sank to sleep.

They sprang as one man to their sides. But alas! though a smile was on each dear one's cheek, yet all the color had fled from thence and cold and motionless were Joseph and Agnes. Like an ice bolt through their parents' heart came the conviction of their deaths. But the old priest did not despair. Laying his hand upon their hearts he ejaculated: "They live; their hearts beat faintly still. Praised be the Lord!" "My child! My child!" was all the parents could utter, as with mingled sobs and thanksgiving they bent over the rescued ones.

A rude litter was hastily formed for the sufferers. They were then wrapped in garments torn from the backs of hardy men, who bore them on their shoulders home; and the first dawn of recollection that broke slowly on Joseph and Agnes was in her father's cottage, with kind neighbors fostering the warmth in their chilled frames, and their parents hanging over them with tears of thankfulness and joy.

What more have we to add? Nothing, save that five years later there was a wedding in the valley of Glendalough and that Agnes and Joseph were the bride and groom.—Barry O'Conner in New York News.

Rivalry in High Life.

"What amuses me more than anything else in society," said a rather cynical woman of fashion, "is to watch people, and see just a little more than is betrayed on the surface; I confess it interests me vastly, although you may think it rather trivial on my part—but it is like reading Thackeray's 'Book of Snobs' illustrated by tableau vivants. At a dinner the other evening, before one of the biggest balls of the season, Mesdames Y. and Z., who were to 'receive' at the big affair later on, were both present, regal in their jewels and general magnificence. 'What is the matter with Mrs. Y.?' said Mrs. S., who sat next me. 'Do you notice how distrait and worried she seems?' 'Yes, and I know the reason,' I answered; 'Mrs. Z. has on better jewels than she has, and her diamonds have never been eclipsed before.'

"'Nonsense,' said my neighbor, 'that surely cannot be the reason; she is too much a woman of the world to give herself away like that. But she certainly looks anything but pleased about something.'

"And indeed her sulkiness, or whatever it was, was obvious, and after dinner she left very early, making some excuse about going home before the ball. 'She is going to put on more jewels, you will see,' I whispered to Mrs. S. 'Well,' she replied, 'if she does, I will say that you are a pretty clever mind reader.' A little later, when we happened to go into the ballroom together, I gave her a triumphant glance—Mrs. Z. had managed to muster just a few more brilliants than her rival and had recovered her good humor."—New York Tribune.

Telling the Bees.

Whittier's ballad, "Telling the Bees," was suggested by a remarkable custom brought from the old country and formerly prevailing in the rural districts of New England. On the death of a member of the family the bees were at once informed of the fact, and their hives dressed in mourning. This ceremonial was supposed to be necessary to prevent the swarms from leaving the hives and seeking a new home.

LIFE OF A DIVER.

A Veteran's Many Hair Raising Experiences Underneath the Water.

BATTLE WITH A MAN EATING SHARK

How the Air Pumps Act When a Man is Over One Hundred Feet Below the Surface of the Sea.

"I was born in Littlefield, a native of Block Island, but now keeper of a fish market on Fountain street, sixty-six years old, was a diver for twenty-four years, in all spent forty years under the water or upon it, and has tackled wrecks from Lake Superior to Niagara Falls and from Maine to Port Royal. He nearly lost his life ten years ago while getting the cargo out of the schooner Warren Gage, off the east of Narragansett pier, and has since that time preferred to stay above water.

"My first experience," said he, "was in Seaconnet river in 1859, hunting for Captain Ben Tallman's son, Jerome. It was in the month of August, and Jerome Tallman had been in the water eleven days. They'd dragged for him, but couldn't find him. I was shipman for Captain Charles Herbert, the wrecker, then, but one day the regular diver took sick, and as they had an agreement giving Captain Herbert $500 if he found the body in three days and $300 if he did not, with the idea of working at it all the time, I was picked out to go down. It was right off Gould's island, and I went down at 7:30 o'clock in the morning. I wasn't used to it, so I took sick about 9:30 o'clock, but I got some old Cognac brandy to drink and went back about 11. The first thing I saw when I got down the second time was a swarm of bluefish. I went through them, and then came a lot of dogfish.

"After I got through them I felt something whirl me around. I could tell it wasn't the current, so I looked around to see what it was. There was a big shark off to my left, looking at me. I'd have given a city to be out of his way, but says I, if I go up he'll bite me in two, and so I decided to stay there. I felt just as if my helmet was rising up. I suppose it was my hair. Well, Mr. Shark looked at me awhile. Then he goes round me twice and a half, and then I got my knife out again. He turns on one side, and I could have put a barrel in his mouth easy. I knew what was coming, so I waited. He dashed for me, and as he came I stepped one side, shut my eyes and slashed with the knife. I caught him in his life, for I cut his heart right in two.

"I opened my eyes and found him lying on the bottom fifty or sixty feet off, the blood rising from him in bubbles. I went up to him, and then something happened to me, I don't know what. I suppose I fainted, for I came to with my body leaning against the shark's, down there on the bottom. Well, I hadn't given any signal to my tender, so he had kept up the air supply, but pretty quick I felt them pull three times, to ask me if I was all right. They said the blood all came up to the top in bubbles before it mixed with the water.

"But, after all, I had my greatest experiences in the two years before the war. The time I went down 168 feet, the deepest I ever got, was in 1860. A vessel went down east-northeast of Point Judith and the captain's wife and daughter were drowned. I went down after them. They talk to me now of going down 500 or 600 feet, but I don't believe it.

"After the first 100 feet the pumps won't supply a man with air, except inside his helmet. Before that it will circulate around his body. When it only reaches his helmet his clothes begin to cling to him and his pores flow out all the water in his body. It is a terrible sensation. Now I got down to this vessel and started to descend into the companionway. At the first step I began to feel numb all over. It was the pressure of the water above me, and as I'd been told about it, I went back on the deck of the sunken vessel and climbed into the ratlines. I hadn't gone up more than three steps before I felt better. Then I went back again. You can continue this right straight along and go deeper each time. When I felt numb again I went upon deck and climbed onto the rail. I was all right in a minute, and then went into the companionway again. All this time the vessel was waving from side to side with the swell under the water.

"Now, it's queer, but there's something about bodies under water. Did you know that if you went into the cabin of a vessel where one was that it would start toward you, almost as if it were alive? It is that that makes the shock so terrible. You can't avoid them. They come as if they wanted to be taken away. Well, the captain's wife and daughter were in the state room at the foot of the stairs and I had to open the door. I took some blocks and braced my whole weight against the door. I weighed 200 pounds and the suit weighed 265 more. I knew there'd be a terrible shock, so I got all ready.

"The door gave way at last and broke into kindling wood like a flash. The concussion of the water flung the bodies toward me like lightning. I shut my eyes, and reaching out to grab the bodies, caught the woman's as she flew toward me. I signaled and was taken up. Then I went down to hunt for the little girl. I found she had come out when her mother did, and floated under the cabin table. Why, that table was set just as when the vessel sunk, and there was food on the plates at that very time. I was pulled up with the little girl."

Pausing, the old diver began to laugh, and when asked what it was about he said it was the air pump. In former times the pumping had been by hand, but now it was by steam. He preferred steam, for it kept up a regular supply of air. When it was done by hand, if a diver wanted more air they were liable to pump too fast, and if he signaled this was so they very likely sent it down too slowly. He told of a trick he once played on a water pipe boss who went down to inspect the pipes on the bottom of Toronto bay. The fellow was a tyrannical Englishman, and was hated by all the men. One day when the boss was under water a workman remarked that he'd like to shut off the air for awhile. Mr. Littlefield said that was wicked, but asked the workmen to light their pipes and smoke near the pump, saying that would do as well as shutting off the air. They didn't all see why, but they did it.

A pump sucks up everything in the air at its orifice, and very shortly it was carrying down tobacco smoke by the cubic foot. Two minutes elapsed, and then the boss gave three wild pulls to be taken up. He arrived at the surface very sick and frightened out of his wits. The first thing he asked was if the pump hadn't got afire. Mr. Littlefield said he guessed it had, and ordered a man to pour water on the bearings. This satisfied the boss, and the men went into fits behind his back. The man would never go down after that; he said he thought he had had an attack of heart disease.—Providence Journal.

KITCHENS ON TOP FLOORS.

An Innovation That Promises to Be More Generally Observed.

Will you have your kitchen in the top story of your house or will you have your boudoir? This is the question yet pending in modern domestic architecture in cities. Everybody agrees that the present system is unwise and wasteful. This assigns the top story for servants' quarters that are rarely occupied except at night, and squanders the glories of sunshine and air that are the prizes of all city architecture.

If the boudoir is in the top of the house there must of course be an elevator. But in all the new houses there are elevators, and the time is not distant when passenger elevators will be as essential a feature of private houses as the dumb waiter.

The late Mrs. Mary Jane Morgan had her boudoir in the upper story of her Madison square mansion. Here were the paintings that pleased her most—those works of art that gave her personal delight. On one side the view commanded the trees of the park, and the distant panorama of the street, and the pageant of the sky. The other side connected with the orchid house, a span of glass resting on the stables. Here was a promenade for a princess.

In a house of one of the Stuyvesant square colony, the architect has devoted the upper story to the private apartments of the lady of the house. Here are low divans, the easiest of chairs, cabinets concealed in the wainscoting which contain all the paraphernalia for immediate hospitalities. Around her are her choicest possessions, her dearest personal belongings. Into this sanctum no profane foot steps. Not even the gentleman to whom she holds allegiance ventures here except by invitation or coveted permission.

Here with nurse, or listening idly to the chorus in the tree tops of the park, she hears the doorbell ring with equanimity. If her mood is social she surrounds herself with chosen spirits, and they are as effectually cut off from interruption and invasion as if in a castle digged around with a moat.

The proximity of the roof to the boudoir suggests its value as a promenade, a retreat in the milder evenings of spring and fall, a place for luxuriance in the sun. Several projects of roof transformation have been proposed, but have not taken effect chiefly by reason of the migratory habits of the leisure class, which does not need such alleviations of city life.

As to the other proposition—the transfer of the kitchen to the upper story—Bruce Price, the architect, has made the experiment in a handsome city house on one of the up town streets. The kitchen looks east, south and west. It is a large, square room, floored and wainscoted with enameled tiles, equipped handsomely after the manner of modern kitchens, and, flooded with light, is as blithe a spot as could be found in any country house.

Adjoining the kitchen is the laundry, alike wainscoted and floored with tiles. Abreast is the servants' sitting room, and beyond their bedrooms. The dumb waiter holds communication with the ground floor and the dining room below.

Both mistress and maids found the arrangement satisfactory. To be sure, there was less social visiting by way of the area, but there were compensations for the maids in having their offices all on one floor, and thereby escaping the weariness of stairs. In the entire aloofness of the domestic machinery the mistress found repose, while the master blessed the sun which sent its first and last rays to the service of the cook for materially reducing his bills for gas.—New York Evening Sun.

A Story of Spurgeon.

A personal experience of Mr. Spurgeon was at the Crystal palace, where he preached to 25,000 people. Seated near to the pulpit, I observed Mrs. Spurgeon take her place just before her husband appeared, and that she was visibly affected by the mighty concourse of souls, all with upturned faces and fixed gaze upon one man, and all about to be thrilled to the core by that man's impassioned appeals to them to be saved alive. While Mrs. Spurgeon was concealing her emotion as best she might—in other words, dealing furtively and shyly with her pocket handkerchief—I saw the pastor beckon far off with his forefinger to one of the deacons.

Some brief, but evidently important, instruction was whispered by Mr. Spurgeon in the man's ear, and 25,000 people were at once agog with curiosity to know what this could possibly be at such a time, when the whole vast place was quivering with anticipation and suppressed emotional excitement. I happened to be seated so near to Mrs. Spurgeon that I at least out of that vast and silent crowd of expectants should hear what had delayed the pastor, and what the urgent matter was he had at such a critical moment to communicate. In a hoarse, fleshly whisper I heard this, "Mr. Spurgeon says, please will you change your seat, so that he will not be able to see you; it" ("it" was doubtless Mrs. Spurgeon's obvious emotion) "makes him nervous," and the lady moved immediately to another seat not visible from the preacher's place.—London World.

A Dull Scholar.

In the market at Darmstadt I watched how a peripatetic dealer in odds and ends made fulminating silver for his pea crackers. I observed the red vapors which were formed when he dissolved his silver, and that he added to it nitric acid, and then a liquid which smelled of brandy, and with which he cleaned dirty coat collars for the people. With this bent of mind it is easy to understand that my position at school was very deplorable; but I had no ear memory and retained nothing or very little of what is learned in this sense. I found myself in the most uncomfortable position in which a boy could possibly be; languages and everything that is acquired by their means, that gains praise and honor in the school, were out of my reach.

When the venerable rector of the gymnasium (Zimmermann), on one occasion of his examination of my class, came to me and made a most cutting remonstrance with me for my want of diligence, how I was the plague of my teachers and the sorrow of my parents, and what did I think was to become of me, and when I answered him that I would be a chemist, the whole school and the good old man himself broke into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, for no one at the time had any idea that chemistry was a thing that could be studied.—Justus Von Liebig in Popular Science Monthly.

Electricity from Wind.

Owing to the comparative scarcity of water power in many parts of England for the generation of power for electrical purposes, attention has been given to wind power, with which the country is well supplied. A small experimental plant has been in operation at a flour mill near London, the windmill supplying sufficient power to run a small dynamo. The current is used to charge a storage battery, form which a number of arc and incandescent lamps are lighted nightly.—New York Journal.

IMITATES BIRDS.

A Young Woman Who Sings Like Nature's Feathered Songsters.

"DEWDROPS OF CELESTIAL MELODY."

She Mimics any Bird From the Duck to the Meadow Lark, or the Nightingale and Thrush.

It is straight from the throat that Miss Mabel Stephenson lets loose that wonderful flood of rippling, twittering bird melody.

It is really very remarkable what this modest and gentle faced young girl does. She is such a very quiet and unobtrusive young person at first sight that the surprise when she gives you the first intimation of her gifts is all the greater.

When in her very artless way she begins her little recitation about birds, and then suddenly breaks into it, and from that moment goes weaving and winding all through it, that marvelous linked chain of all the liquid bird melody of an entire forest and meadow bird orchestra, the effect is quite startling.

Shut your eyes, and you are no longer in the frowzy atmosphere of a theater. It is an early morning in June, and you are out in the woods somewhere. There are no electric lights and gas jets. It is blazing summer sunlight. It is the odor of the forest, not of the footlights, that comes to you. Certainly it is a very astonishing thing to be done just by the loosening and contracting of vocal chords, with the valuable aid of bronchial tubes and a thorax.

A REMARKABLE GIFT.

Miss Stephenson says, and after hearing her you are quite prepared to believe it, that she can imitate any bird that wears wings and feathers, and as wings and feathers are part of the anatomical equipment of all birds, it amounts to saying that she can imitate them all. She can give the judicious and nonfrivolous "quack, quack" of the conservative and serious minded duck as accurately as she can imitate the giddy, soaring song of the vanishing skylark. It was a very early acquisition with her. She took to talking bird lingo almost as soon as she took to talking the sound commercial English of Michigan, where she was born.

She is a true American girl, Miss Stephenson, and she has mingled in the very best American bird society. Her repertoire is almost exclusively that of our own sweet singing American birds. She was in England recently, and picked up the songs of the thrush, nightingale and skylark just to show these stars of English bird opera that their songs were easy enough, and that anybody who had had a course in an American bird music conservatory could do them. But it is the whippoorwill, the yellow breast, the chicadee, the redbird, the catbird, the meadow lark, the swallow, the bobolink and, of course, the robin with the red waistcoat—these are the birds, good Americans all, whose songs she loves best to sing.

Then she can give to perfection the weird, melancholy cry of the loon and can pipe so like the quail that you have only to shut your eyes and fancy that you are out in the brown stubble of the fields. Neither the domestic goose nor the grave and reverend owl can be classed exactly among the merry warbling songsters of the feathered kind, but they each have a method of expressing disapproval.

HOW SHE LEARNED.

It was simply for her own amusement that she first developed her remarkable gifts of imitation, until now she has found that she can turn it to a source of profit, and this she is doing.

Her bird language education was only just begun in the country out in Michigan. When she was a very little girl she came to New York to live, and since then she has had to depend upon bird stores and upon such birds as she and her friends possess for her tuition.

Now, to come back to the physiological feature of the matter, there are a good many people who will tell you just exactly how Miss Stephenson does these wonderful imitations. It is nothing more than whistling pure and simple, many of them will say. The very keen and knowing ones sneer even at whistling. Nobody could whistle in that way, they say, with just the whistling apparatus furnished by nature. Miss Stephenson, they will tell you, has some ingenious little mechanical device for making the sounds, which she conceals in her mouth.

All this makes the gifted bird soloist laugh. She could not whistle a note if she tried, she says, and as for carrying something in her mouth you have only to watch her as she gives imitations to be convinced that this is all rubbish. She simply has a marvelous development of the vocal chords, which has been developed by years of practice that began when she was a mere child and when the throat muscles and vocal chords were pliant and flexible. The sounds come straight from the throat, as was remarked at the beginning of this article, and as you can see very plainly yourself if you are near by when the imitations are given. You will then very distinctly observe the throat flutter, as does that of a canary when he is soaring up in the high notes of some of his dizziest trills.

Speaking of trills, Miss Stephenson says these, curiously enough, are the easiest and least tiresome of the bird songs to imitate. It is the short, sharp twitters and the long, wailing cries which are the most trying.—New York World.

We can all recall some kindly grandmother of old times, who, as she tied her gold beads around the neck of a grandchild, who like Leah was "tender eyed," half apologetically explained the exceptional favor, "The beads, you know, will be good for Helen's eyes." A dignified gentleman, a man distinguished in great public matters, only a few days ago twirled an iron ring around his finger, and in explanation said, "That's for rheumatism!"

Women of the Middle Ages.

It is perhaps doubtful whether modern civilization tends to produce women of such strength of character and such intellectual and social acquirements as those who were the wives and daughters of the lords and captains of the feudal ages. The art and the literature of the Fifteenth century have immortalized women who remain models of virtue and refinement. In the Middle Ages, also, if we only took the trouble to study them, we should find that the women of the Latin nations were extremely cultivated and most intimately and affectionately associated with the lives and cares of their lords. At least such appears to have been the case in France, if we may judge from the romances, the chronicles and the poetry of the Twelfth, Thirteenth and Fourteenth centuries, and from the evidence of the splendid monuments of architecture and the grand old tombs which have preserved the memories of so many ladies in sculptured effigies and eloquent epitaphs.

Like the model of feminine good breeding depicted by Castiglione at the court of Urbino, the ladies of the Middle Ages had not only the charm of delicate education and varied accomplishments, but also manly sentiments, a love of justice, a marked hatred of hypocrites and cowards and fine independence of character. Their conversation must indeed have had great charm, seeing that their feudal lords remembered it even in the heat of battle and looked forward to its solace as one of the sweets of victory.—Theodore Child in Harper's Bazar.

Women in George I's Time.

A manuscript diary of a middle class family belonging to the time of George I shows anything but a stay at home life. The ladies were always going about. But they staid at home in the evenings. There was a very good reason why the women should stay at home. The streets were infested with prowling thieves and with dangerous bullies; no woman could go out after dark in the city without an armed escort of her father's apprentices or his men servants. The occupations of a young lady—not a lady of the highest fashion—of this time are given by a contemporary writer.

He says that she makes tippets, works handkerchiefs in catgut, collects shells, makes grottoes, copies music, paints, cuts out figures and landscapes and makes screens. She dances a minuet or cotillon, and she can play ombre, lansquenet, quadrille and Pope Joan. These are frivolous accomplishments, but the writer says nothing of the morning's work—the distilling of creams, the confecting of cakes and puddings and sauces, the needlework and all the useful things.

They did not always stay at home. In the summer they sometimes went to Vauxhall, where the girls enjoyed the sight of the wicked world as much as they liked, the singing and supper and the punch that followed.—Walter Besant in Harper's.

She Never Thought.

A lady possessing a treasure of a domestic was surprised and angry to learn that said treasure was about to leave her employ.

"I consider your conduct very ungrateful," she said angrily. "I have paid you good wages and taught you to do many things, and this is the way you treat me. It is shameful."

The girl murmured something about being sorry, but persisted in her determination to go.

"You can at least tell me why you are leaving," said her mistress.

"Well," said the girl, "when you were sick I gave my bed to the nurse and slept on the floor, and I cannot get over the cold I caught then; and carrying all your meals up stairs gave me a hurt in the side, and I froze my fingers hanging out clothes, and the doctor says it's too hard, and if I don't quit I'll break down."

"Nellie, is this true?" asked her mistress, with tears in her eyes; "I never thought of it before. You shall stay and I will get some one to help you, and I'll take care of you myself until you are quite well and strong."

Nellie staid, and her mistress did as she promised, and this true story is commended to other housekeepers who have a treasure they are thoughtlessly overburdening.—Detroit Free Press.

Training of Girls in China.

During her first ten years the Chinese girl enjoys as much freedom as a boy; like a boy, she wears her hair in a long "pigtail," and frequently goes about in boy's attire, especially where there are no sons in the family—for in that case the Chinese wish to maintain the illusion that the house is not without male descendants. During this time, also, no matter what her station, she is trained in all household duties and woman's handicrafts. A high value is put on becoming demeanor, decent bearing and clothing, and in many houses it is considered a point of honor for the daughter to be able to prepare a large part of her dowry with her own hand.

While the little Chinese girl may be no less fortunate than a European child, during these years of impressionable childhood the Chinese parents, with only few exceptions, commit the first wrong to their daughters by letting them grow up without any schooling. This applies especially to the north; in the south, particularly in the Quang-Tong province, in which Canton lies, a better report was obtained. Although there education among women did not begin to be so common as among men, there were a few schools for girls under women's directions, while many received instruction from private teachers at the homes of their parents—Chautauquan.

A Pretty Den.

If you are repairing an old house and wish to have one or two striking and effective features, choose a room for a den and have the whole of a windowless side finished with drawers, cupboards, nooks and pigeonholes. Shut in some of these with stained glass doors, drape others with real silk or blue and white porcelain tinted crapy goods. Leave a gallery along the top for busts, pottery or unframed paintings. Cover the floor with matting and rugs, and if possible place low seats in the windows for plants or books. Select wrought iron frames for hanging lamps, with a copper candlestick placed here and there.

An old portable clothes closet may be converted into a corner shrine for such a room by being covered with dark red plush, in which is kept some family heirlooms. A few odd bamboo pieces of furniture will best harmonize with the rest of the room, or stiff carved chairs in dark mahogany, while an old fashioned desk, such as was in constant use in New England years ago, or any antique table or stand, will find a suitable abiding place here.—Exchange.

A Poor Way to Bring Up Children.

It never makes children better to tell them a dozen times a day that they are too mean for any use.—Ram's Horn.

UNHAPPY QUEENS

Uneasy Heads That Were Not Born to Wear Royal Crowns.

OBJECTS OF SYMPATHY AND PITY.

Eight European Sovereigns Who Were Not of Royal Birth.—Sad Stories of Their Lives.

Although there exists a popular impression to the effect that thrones in these modern times are beyond the reach of those who do not happen to be of imperial or royal birth, yet the fact remains that during the present century there have been no less than eight women who, notwithstanding the absence of the blood of monarchs in their veins, have been raised from among the people to sovereign rank.

It is worthy of note, however, that the crowns won by the eight women of non-royal birth to whom I have referred above have proved to be of an exceedingly thorny character. Indeed, each of these fair sovereigns remains on record as an object of sympathy and of pity rather than of envy. Their elevation above the heads of the people to whom they belonged has been accompanied by an amount of unhappiness, misery and bitterness far beyond the share that falls to the lot of the ordinary woman, and the celebrity which surrounds their names is due not so much to the brilliancy as to the sadness of their lot.

Empress Josephine owes her place in the niche of history to the heartless treatment to which she was subjected by her husband, and she is remembered—not as the brilliant and frivolous consort of the monarch who, for twelve years, was the mightiest in Christendom, but as the pitiable victim of his selfish ambition and of his cruelty.

A MOTHER OF A NAPOLEON.

Equally sad was the fate of beautiful Hortense, mother of Napoleon III, who, from the day she became queen of Holland until the time of her death in poverty, abandonment and exile, was a disappointed, sorrowing and heartbroken woman. The gilded apple of royalty, which had been placed in her hands in 1804, had turned into Dead sea fruit. She had seen her eldest son die, her second son killed and her third son a fugitive, forced to seek a haven of refuge in the United States.

The very name she bore was proscribed, all her relatives were either in banishment or dead, while her poverty was so great that she was forced to appeal to King Louis Philippe, the bitterest enemy of her house and the most relentless persecutor of her surviving son. Nor was the fate of Queen Caroline Murat, whose husband was first imprisoned and then executed by the order of the Bourbon king of Naples, any happier.

Julia and Desiree Clary, the two daughters of the Marseilles broker, who became respectively queen of Spain and queen of Sweden, were both noted for their domestic sorrows, and for the neglect and indignities of every kind to which they were subjected by their husbands.

Exile, widowhood and the tragical death of her only son in South Africa have endowed Eugenie de Montijo, the granddaughter of the Scotch merchant Kirkpatrick, with a majesty which, though sorrowful, is far superior to any which she ever possessed in the days of her greatest magnificence at the Tuileries. The aspect of the once beautiful, brilliant and supremely elegant, but now broken, infirm and prematurely aged consort of Napoleon III is sufficient to excite commiseration even in the hearts of the bitterest enemies of the Bonaparte regime.

Yet another of these heroines of royal romance is Natalie de Kechko, the more or less legally divorced queen of King Milan of Servia. Her life until now has even been more strange, more extraordinary and more full of exciting incident than those of the other three ladies above mentioned. Were it described in a novel it would be set down as extravagant, unreal and impossible; but far from such being the case, it constitutes one of the most romantic pages of the contemporary history of Europe.

QUEEN NATALIE.

Queen Natalie spent most of her childhood at Florence, where she attended one of the schools, a number of young American girls being among her schoolmates. On completing her education she lived some time on her father's estates in southern Russia and at St. Petersburg, where she, however, did not figure among what Thackeray describes as the "upper suckles."

Finding that his advances were spurned at all the foreign courts and even by the great families of the nobility on the Continent, Milan determined to fly for inferior game and to content himself with wealth instead of lineage. This he found combined with beauty of no ordinary nature in young Natalie Kechko, at that time only eighteen years of age. His request for her hand—and for her fortune of course—was not received with any great enthusiasm by Colonel Kechko, who was warned by his friends that the princely throne of Servia would constitute a bad investment for his money. At length, however, yielding to a hint from the authorities at St. Petersburg, who realized the advantages of having a Russian girl as mistress of the palace at Belgrade, he gave his consent, and the marriage was celebrated on Oct. 17, 1875, in the Servian metropolis.

A few years later, on Milan's assumption of the title of king, the pretty little schoolgirl of Florence became a full fledged queen. From that moment her sorrows began. They are of too recent a character to need any description anew here. But it must be admitted that she has suffered more than most women, and the incredible indignities and cruelties to which she has been subjected, both as a wife and as a mother, are sufficient to win for her the pity of all right minded and good hearted people and to discourage young girls from all inclination to grasp the royal or imperial crowns that may be brought within their reach.—Ex-Diplomat in New York Tribune.

Chicago's Shipping.

Chicago's shipping is second only to that of New York. From it the cereals of the northwestern states are transported through Lakes Huron and Erie to Buffalo, whence they are forwarded to New York by rail or by the Erie canal. Grain intended for Montreal may be carried over the lakes and down the St. Lawrence without once breaking bulk, and it is contemplated even to run steamers direct to England.—C. C. Rogers in Scribner's.

Wild Bananas Have Seeds.

Wild varieties of bananas have been found in Ceylon, Cochin China and the Philippines. These of course have seeds, but they are inferior to the long cultivated varieties. The banana is cultivated by suckers, and it is in this way that the plant is perpetuated indefinitely.—Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 26 1894

Notwithstanding the great number of residence houses that have been built in this city the past year, it is next to impossible to find a vacant dwelling at reasonable rent and of genteel appeapance. We conversed with a lady yesterday who has come here to permanently reside. She had canvassed all the real estate offices and had worn herself out looking for a respectable residence of eight rooms or so, and gave her task up in despair. This incident suggests to us the fact that there are a great number of vacant spaces between, say, the business portion of the city and Washington street. Their owners would meet a want that is keenly felt, if they would make them revenue producing by building a neat but not costly style of residence upon them. The hint is also intended for our beautiful suberbs across the river. Population is coming to us rapidly, and we should keep pace in residence improvements with the wonderful growth of our city.—Los Angeles Herald.

The San Francisco Post comes out with a demand for the resignation of Viscount Cornely, assistant Director General of the Midwinter fair, because of alleged crookedness in connection with concessions granted by him while in Chicago representing the management in San Francisco. The Post intimates that Cornely is very much interested in some of these concessions and now has $7,500 which should have been turned over to the financial managers in San Francisco. Director General de Young is said to have denounced Cornely as wholly unworthy of the position he holds, but the management is afraid to demand his resignation for fear of hurting the fair, in view of the prominent part he took in it at the beginning. It is going to be a pity if the Midwinter fair is to be involved in scandals like this before it is formally opened. What will result before the fair closes.

The late Senator Stanford's widow is not left so badly off, after all. The appraisement of the estate was filed last week; and exclusive of the Palo Alto, Gridley and Vina ranchos, it amounts to the comfortable sum of $17,600,000. The properties named, which are exceedingly valuable, had been donated to the Leland Stanford jr., university. Almost any person of moderate ideas could get along on this sum, particularly as it is limited to the property left by the deceased senator in California. If the figures were doubled the real value of the estate would be approximated.

The Congressional committee of Ways and Means has perfected an income tax law which they believe will, if passed, do away with the objectionable Paul-Pry features of the income tax law of 1862. A universal tax of two per cent. is placed on corporations. This tax must be reserved out of the dividends when declared, and a like tax is placed on all incomes over $4,000 a year. For failure of the individual liable to this tax to report the same to the assessor a heavy penalty is attached. There is great opposition to the bill in both houses and it is very doubtful if it will pass.

The Democrats of Ohio the other day set a good example to the people of the whole country when they took part in the ceremonies of inaugurating Governor McKinley. They showed that they respected the chief executive of their State, though they do not endorse his political principles. How would it do for our Republican friends to show some of the same spirit occasionally, instead of so often attributing dishonorable motives to the President for everything he does or does not do?

Every time Andrew Carnegie makes a public exhibition of philanthropy he reduces the wages of the men employed in his various protected manufacturing establishments, and he never makes a contribution of money to any cause that is not heralded to the people on every telegraph wire in the land.

Ordinance No. 50.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every male person over twenty-one and under fifty five years of age, found in each Road District of the County of Inyo, State of California, between the first day of March, 1894, and the thirty first day of December, 1894, excepting all persons who were honorably discharged from service in the army or navy of the United States, at any time between the first day of April, in the year A. D. 1861, and the first day of September, A. D. 1865, and who have not paid the same in some other road district, must pay to the said County of Inyo, a road poll tax of two dollars.

SECTION 2. Said road poll tax shall be collected by the Assessor of the said County of Inyo, in the same manner that State Poll Taxes are collected, and shall be paid to the Treasurer of the said County of Inyo and shall be placed to the credit of the several road districts of the said County of Inyo from which said road poll tax was collected.

SECTION 3. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and Ordinance No. 46 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 9th day of January, 1893, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances and parts of Ordinances of said Board in conflict here with are hereby repealed.

SECTION 4. This Ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said County of Inyo, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

Ordinance No. 51.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep in the County of Inyo, State of California, must annually procure a license therefor from the Tax-Collector of said Inyo County, and must make therefor the following payment:

1. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five thousand sheep or more shall constitute the first class, and must pay Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars per annum for the first five thousand sheep, and for every additional thousand sheep the sum of Fifty Dollars per annum.

2. Those owning and having in their possession and under their control four thousand sheep and less than five thousand constitute the second class, and must pay Two Hundred Dollars per annum.

3. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand five hundred sheep and less than four thousand constitute the third class and must pay One Hundred and seventy-five Dollars per annum.

4. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand sheep and less than three thousand five hundred constitute the fourth class and must pay One Hundred and fifty Dollars per annum.

5. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand five hundred sheep and less than three thousand constitute the fifth class and must pay One Hundred and twenty-five Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand sheep and less than two thousand five hundred constitute the sixth class and must pay One Hundred Dollars per annum.

7. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand five hundred sheep and less than two thousand constitute the seventh class and must pay Seventy-five Dollars per annum.

8. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand sheep and less than one thousand five hundred constitute the eighth class, and must pay Fifty Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five hundred sheep and less than one thousand constitute the ninth class and must pay Twenty-five dollars per annum.

10. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control a less number than five hundred sheep constitute the tenth class, and must pay Twelve Dollars and fifty cents per annum.

SECTION 2. The license provided for by this ordinance shall be deemed a debt due the said County of Inyo, and the Tax-Collector of the said Inyo County shall have the collection of said license, and it is hereby made his duty to collect the same, and any person required to take out a license under the provisions of this ordinance, who fails or neglects, or refuses to take out such license, the said Tax-Collector may direct suit to be brought in the name of the County of Inyo as plaintiff, for the recovery of said license and in such case either the Tax Collector or the attorney for the said plaintiff in said suit may make the necessary affidavit for, and a writ of attachment may issue without any bond being given on behalf of the plaintiff, and in case of recovery by the said plaintiff, fifty dollars damages must be added to the judgment and costs, to be collected from the defendant.

SECTION 3. The County Auditor of said Inyo County shall prepare and have printed, suitable blank licenses for the said Tax Collector to carry out the provisions of this ordinance, with a blank receipt attached, for the signature of the Tax-Collector, when sold.

SECTION 4. The said Tax Collector shall collector a fee of one dollar for each license sold which shall be paid into the Salary fund of the said Inyo County.

SECTION 5. All moneys collected for licenses under the provisions of this ordinance shall be paid over to the County Treasurer of said Inyo County as other moneys, and shall be placed to the credit of the Salary fund of said County.

SECTION 6. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and ordinance No. 41 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 7th day of January, 1892, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances or parts of ordinances of said Board, in conflict herewith, are each and all of them hereby repealed.

SECTION 7. This ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said Inyo County, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty-five days.

Bar silver, 66¾.

Beautiful winter weather these days.

J. C. Miller was at Independence yesterday.

O. I. Mairs visited Bishop early in the week.

Silver is quoted 2½ cents lower this week than last.

Otis Clarke was down from Bishop during the week.

District Attorney Forbes returned from Bishop last Tuesday.

California produced $13,026,910 worth of bullion in 1893.

J. D. Lewis Esq., came down from Bishop early in the week.

O. I. Mairs has leased the Bishop Creek Hotel to Mrs. T. K. Hutchison.

It is reported that Fred Holbert has leased the Sanger ranch at Alvord.

White Smith has almost entirely recovered from his recent attack of rheumatism.

A letter from Bakersfield states that Will Sanger has disposed of all his horses at fairly good prices.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Bell came down from Big Pine on Wednesday, returning yesterday morning.

Henry McMurry has nearly completed a new residence on his land about two miles south-east of Big Pine.

Miss Grace McAfee came in from Fish Lake Valley last week and is visiting with her sister, Mrs. J. R. Eldred, at Big Pine.

Mrs. Thos. Williams of Big Pine expects to start for the Midwinter Fair to-morrow morning. She will be gone about a month.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz expect to start for San Francisco on Tuesday next. They will probably be absent about three weeks.

The Inyo Canal Company, Hon. Tremore Coffin, President and F. Melver, Supt. has subscribed $100 to Inyo County Midwinter fair exhibit.

Parties holding warrants of the 18th Dist. Agricultural Association, can have the same cashed by presenting them to the Treasurer, Henry Rhine, at Independence.

W. K. Miller writes us from Keeler that the fare from Keeler to San Francisco and return via Mojave, has been fixed at $24.35, including five admission coupons to the Midwinter fair.

J. R. Eldred and Dave Pittman are mining in in Lead canyon. There are several other parties interested in that section, and considerable work will be done there during the coming season.

The Index reminds one of nothing so much as Henry Cartier's description of his terrier: "He is a great bluffer; you pay no attention to him and he will growl, and bark, and snap at you. But he won't bite.

Dr. McQueen has been very busy all the week repairing the masticating element of the community. He will remain here until Wednesday of next week when he will go to Lone Pine. All requiring dental work done should fix a date with him immediately.

D. H. Irland, Chief contractor of the Mt. Whitney canal, left for Los Angeles last Sunday. He expects to return in about ten days. The most favorable news has been received from London regarding the enterprise and its ultimate success may be considered assured.

This week's Index pleads the baby act and endeavors to foist upon us the onerous duty of guardian. Don't be uneasy, neighbor, or give way to peurile anxiety; there is said to be a special Providence that protects children, fools and drunken men, so you are all right.

An Explanation.

The following is taken from a letter received from Los Angeles last Monday, and we do not think even the most captious can reasonably find fault with its publication.

" " " " Looking over my article in the New Year's Herald I find that there is some ground for the complaint made in the Register that very little is there said about Bishop. But that was no fault of mine. In the manuscript furnished by me to the Herald Bishop was described precisely as it appears in my last pamphlet; in fact, I clipped that description from the pamphlet and pasted it in my manuscript. But the matter furnished by me would have filled over seven columns of the Herald and the paper could not afford to give so great an amount of space to one county, even if paid for it. To do so would necessarily exclude entirely description of other counties. The Herald editor exercised his own discretion in cutting from the manuscript; had I done the cutting the description of Bishop would have been retained. But nobody except a man very ignorant of what is going on the world would find fault with the article as it stands in the Herald. Only the grossest stupidity will imagine that any part of Owens Valley can be benefited without the whole being gainer. All parts of the Valley have resources of land and water that will attract settlers and only a mischievous dunce will say one word to a stranger in dispraise of any other part of the county than where he may happen to cumber the earth with his presence. There are men like frogs, who, when they raise their head above the puddle in which their lives are spent, do so only to utter a dismal croak; it it were not for croaking their very existence would not be noticed."

C. MULHOLLAND.

Making Themselves Homes

A trip to Big Pine, after an absence of only a few months, shows vast improvement in the surrounding country. South and east of town a large acreage of new ground is being brought under cultivation. What but a few years ago was a barren plain several miles in extent, will soon be all bearing alfalfa and other crops. The big improvement has been made possible by the building of the Big Pine canal. Wherever water is brought upon land in the Valley, the production of taxable property is an immediate result. The country surrounding Big Pine, when in the natural state, is a nearly level plain covered with high sagebrush, indicating that the land is of excellent quality. There is just sufficient fall to render it easy of irrigation, and there is plenty of water to bring the entire territory under cultivation. Several young men, with no assistance except their own industry, are building up valuable homes. The country is being dotted with new buildings, and an air of prosperity pervades all.

Califora a Will Do.

The Index is constantly talking about "hope deferred" and "waiting." If that barnacle would do more "rustling" and less "waiting" it might assist, even in a very small way, to bring about the good times that are in store for us all in the near future. We must give it credit for one thing, however; a persistent effort to cause Inyo county to become a part of Nevada. Every business man in the county who would like to see that point accomplished should immediately and cheerfully answer the call of the Index for funds, that it may be better enabled to carry out that purpose. We take this occasion to say, however, that California is good enough for us.

The Black Warrior Mine.

Tressel & Munn are at work developing the Black Warrior mine, about six miles west of Big Pine. There is a shaft sunk about 110 feet in the ledge, and at a point 60 feet from the surface a tunnel has been run 200 feet along the ledge. The ore assays about $23 a ton all through and is free milling gold. The mine is about 300 yards from Big Pine creek, and there is plenty of timber all around it. The ledge is about a foot thick, has clearly defined walls, the hanging being slate and the foot granite with clay casings. There is every indication of the mine developing into a permanent and valuable property.

Washington's Birthday.

Big Pine will celebrate Washington's Birthday, February 22nd. A purse of $150 will be given for a quarter race, entrance ten per cent of purse, entrance money added. Free for all horses owned in Inyo County. There is talk of a base-ball game, but definite arrangements have not yet been made. In the evening a grand ball will be given at the Big Pine Hotel. There is no place in the State where visitors are more hospitably entertained than at Big Pine, and a thoroughly good time is sure to be had.

Public Notice

I take this means of notifying S. A. Densmore that his irrigating ditch running through my land is damaging my property by making deep cuts and washes. And you are hereby notified to repair said ditch and put it in condition to prevent further damage.

C. A. WALTER.

Attention is directed to the tabulated pedigree of Osito, 19,726, published this week. It will be seen that he is a grandly bred colt, both his sire and dam coming from the highest speed producing lines. As he will be bred to a very limited number of mares, intending breeders should communicate with his owner without delay. First come, first served.

Last Saturday evening the following officers of Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M. were installed: Irv. H. Mulholland, W. M. H. P. Cartier, S. W.; J. A. McKenzie, J. W.; O. I. Mairs, Treas.; B. Rhine, Sec.; J. S. Gorman, S. D.; Paul Houard, J. D.; G. W. Brady, Tyler.

J. F. Beale, station agent at Citrus, informs us that tickets are now on sale in his office to the Midwinter fair in conformity with the new schedule. The rate is $25 60, including four entrance coupons to the fair, tickets good for thirty days.

McNulty, the wife murderer, is to be hanged in San Francisco to-day. The Governor has refused to interfere with the execution of the sentence.

The telegraph yesterday reported that Corbett had defeated Mitchell in three rounds. No particulars have been obtained.

Railroad Traffic During the Fair.

So far as the figures at hand go they show that the number of people brought into Chicago by the 21 passenger lines entering here during the fair period were in round numbers 3,335,000. This allows 350,000 each for the five leading passenger lines, 300,000 each for the five next following, 150,000 each for the next group of five, and 50,000 each for the six weak lines. Allowing each of these passengers to have visited the fair five times would account for an attendance of 16,755,000, which would be a good proportion of outside visitors. It would leave but a little over 5,000,000 visits from Chicagoans.—Chicago News.

Champion Cotton Picker of Texas.

The best day's cotton picking by any one in the county this year, to which our attention has been directed, was done on Friday on Turkey Creek by Will J. Daniel. On that day he picked 804 pounds. During the present season he picked 9,514 pounds, and says an average day's work for him is 400 pounds.—Taylor Dispatch in Galveston News.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT which appeared in our columns some time since, announcing a special arrangement with Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., of Enosburgh Falls, Vt., publishers of "A Treatise on the Horse and his Diseases," whereby our subscribers were enabled to obtain a copy of that valuable work FREE by sending their address (and inclosing a two-cent stamp for mailing same) to Dr. B. J. Kendall Co., is renewed for a limited period. We trust all will avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining this valuable work. To every lover of the horse it is indispensable, as it treats in a simple manner all the diseases which afflict this noble animal. Its phenomenal sale throughout the United States and Canada makes it standard authority. MENTION THIS PAPER WHEN SENDING FOR THE TREATISE.

THE HIGHEST AWARD.

Royal Baking Powder has all the Honors —In Strength and Value 20 Per Cent above its Nearest Competitor.

The Royal Baking Powder has the enviable record of having received the highest award for articles of its class—greatest strength, purest ingredients, most perfectly combined—wherever exhibited in competition with others. In the exhibitions of former years, at the Centennial, at Paris, Vienna and at the various State and Industrial fairs, where it has been exhibited, judges have invariably awarded the Royal Baking Powder the highest honors.

At the recent World's Fair the examinations for the baking powder awards were made by the experts of the chemical division of the Agricultural Department at Washington. The official report of the tests of the baking powders which were made by this department for the specific purpose of ascertaining which was the best, and which has been made public, shows the leavening strength of the Royal to be 160 cubic inches of carbonic gas per ounce of powder. Of the cream of tartar baking powders exhibited at the Fair, the next highest in strength thus tested contained but 133 cubic inches of leavening gas. The other powders gave an average of 111. The Royal, therefore, was found of 20 per cent. greater leavening strength than its nearest competitor, and 44 per cent. above the average of all the other tests. Its superiority in other respects, however, in the quality of the food it makes as to fineness, delicacy and wholesomeness, could not be measured by figures.

It is these high qualities, known and appreciated by the women of the country for so many years, that have caused the sales of the Royal Baking Powder, as shown by statistics, to exceed the sales of all other baking powders combined.

Costly Wedding Presents for Sale.

It is a pitiful item in a story full of pathos that several of the presents originally bought as wedding gifts for the Princess May should now be once more offered to the public, their intended designation lending them a special charm to a certain class of buyers. One feels additionally touched when one remembers the delight with which the princess is said to have received those which were sent her before her terrible trouble. Yet in a little shop in the Strand, well known to connoisseurs, can be seen the celebrated Tiffany necklace, a riviere of magnificent diamonds, which was bought in New York to present to the popular princess.

Another particular treasure is a sapphire. I was going to say a priceless stone, but truth to tell it is priced, and its value is £5,000. It is a perfect stone, without flaw, of exquisite color, two inches long and 1½ inches broad. At present it is set around with fine brilliants and forms a royal looking brooch. The other day a would be purchaser brought his wife to see the present he proposed to make, but she would have nothing to say to the jewel. "No, thank you," she exclaimed; "I should feel like a church window if I wore that." So the treasured heirloom of an old noble Russian family is still in the market.

Newest Mode of Burglary.

The other day a gentleman in a northern suburb found a stranger ascending his staircase, who, without betraying any emotion, said he had come about the repairs. "Oh, yes," replied the owner, "but I am in a hurry to keep an engagement just now. Come out with me, and I'll tell you what I want done." The two walked out together, the householder talking about waterpipes and tanks, and the stranger answering with a glibness that showed considerable experience, until they came to a policeman, when the former at once gave the pretended plumber into his custody for being in his house with unlawful intent.

Upon him were found the usual instruments of the burglar's business, and when taken to the police station he was soon identified as an expert crib cracker, who was already wanted on several charges of housebreaking and burglary. People will do well to view with suspicion men who come to their dwellings to do repairs which have never been ordered.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Telephones for Use in Battle.

Particulars of the behavior of the field telephone system in the French autumn maneuvers have now been published. Magneto telephones were used, as no delicate microphone or battery is required with them. The transmitter was held in the hand and the receiver was affixed to the "kepi." Combined receivers and transmitters were also employed. A bare bimetallic wire 0.6 millimeters in diameter was unrolled from a drum and laid out of harm's way on hedges, branches, walls and in trenches.

A line twenty-three kilometers long was thus laid, with the addition of ten posts, in five hours; speech was good, and the whole was taken up again in an hour. During a sham fight a cavalry division passed over a long line without interrupting the communication. A bayonet stuck in the ground made a good earth circuit, so did the body of a cavalry horse if the wire was attached to the bridle.—London Globe.

Russian Discipline.

Much comment has been excited by a recent occurrence at Wilna, in western Russia. The men of one of the batteries of an artillery regiment stationed at Wilna mutinously refused to salute one of their officers when he came among them. He summoned them more than once to pay him the due sign of respect, but the soldiers paid no attention. The officer, enraged at this behavior, at length drew his revolver and shot two noncommissioned officers, one after the other. He was taking aim at a third when the soldiers, in fear of their lives, at length gave the proper salute. The incident is being hotly discussed in military circles, some officers maintaining that their confrere was justified in his act, while others condemn his extreme conduct.—London Times.

A Strange Explosion.

Seth Williams and Morris McClelland met death in a mysterious explosion at Cave City, Ky. They were digging a cistern and had reached a flat rock eight feet down. Williams struck the rock with a sledge hammer, causing a terrible explosion, which buried McClelland beneath flying bowlders and killed him, and threw Williams into a tree fifty yards away. McClelland lived just long enough to tell what had happened. Several persons have closely examined the scene of the explosion, but discovered nothing beyond bluish vapor with a sulphurous smell issuing from between two large rocks.—Exchange.

My Heart's Delight.

By LOUISE STOCKTON.

"Very well," said I, "some one must take care of you, and I am going to ask you to let me try for a little while until your uncle has slept his anger off. And although we do not actually need another editor you can be of use to us, and I want you to come."

Did she resent this half grudging invitation? No. She looked at me with content and happiness in her eyes and asked me if she should begin the next morning.

When Hale came down stairs Miss Woolstine was gone and I was in a little room back of our office taking papers out of a desk.

"How is this," he said with a fine affectation of wonder, "didn't you get off?"

"Hale," said I, "we are going to have another editor, and this room will have to be made ready for her at once. I think we'll put a matting on the floor and make it look clean and cool, and we'll hang a pink curtain at the window. This desk will do, but we must get a better chair. If you will clear our belongings out I'll send Marvey for the scrub woman and I'll go for the matting."

"By George!" said he, "are you daft? What on earth are you talking about?"

And when I told him he listened and his only reply was an occasional ejaculation of "Oh, Lord!" but his intonation of that expression never varied.

CHAPTER II.

I sat down crushed and guilty.

It is very certain that had Miss Woolstine gone to the office of The Royal Express she would not have had the chance for housekeeping that we afforded her. With a little white apron tied over her dark dress, and an obtrusive duster in her hand, she very soon learned to keep us in very good order indeed. But she had the rare, most angelic talent of making that order ours and not her own. She never put our inkstands in the middle of the tables. Mine stood as I liked it, close to my hand, while Hale's was at arm's length from his, and she never mixed a revise with the first proofs. If I put a book on a shelf I found it there, dusted no doubt, but where I had laid it. Life in our establishment was very simple. There was no rush of reporters, no late hours, no excitement over news.

The flowers bloomed in the spring, and we told how to care for them and what to buy, and we grafted, budded, plowed and reaped without even as much as a harvest dinner to look after. Vainglorious old farmers sent us samples of prodigious corn and pumpkins, and market gardeners didn't forget to let us see their prize fruit and berries. Everything sweet and pretty went to Miss Margaret as her natural fee; and she it was who opened the boxes of flowers, the baskets of fruit, and it was she who introduced the spirit lamp and tea kettle, and who made a corner in her office where she served our little Arcadian lunches of bread and butter, fruit and coffee. But it was Hale who bought the teacups, and money enough must he have spent on them.

There were not two happier old boys than we in the city that summer, and we never tired of telling each other what an admirable person Miss Woolstine was. She was very useful to us. Her style in writing was full of sparkle, and her very notices of giant radishes or new harrows had little graceful terms of expression that took them out of the common and made them readable. She wrote our business letters, she scissored, she read proof and filed it, she sorted the mail, she kept the water cooler in order, she opened the exchanges, she took the most complete and unobtrusive interest in everything, but with it all she kept herself apart with a gentle reserve that made us greatly admire her.

As I knew her better I saw there was trouble in her life, and I suspected it arose from her quarrel with her uncle. He had been a father to her, and she had left him and was boarding in another part of the city. I knew that it was impossible that he should not miss her, and she often spoke of her old home with a lingering tenderness that was pathetic. Of the circumstances of the quarrel I knew nothing, but Hale and I agreed that Mr. Mason had been to blame.

And so the summer wore away. Hale went back and forth from his house by the sea, and I came in every day from my farm at Melvin, but Miss Woolstine staid in the city. We invited her to visit us, we urged her to take a holiday, but she replied that she was perfectly well, and that work suited her better than play.

"If we did that sort of thing," said I, one day, "we'd send you to write up the Tiger Hill strike. You'd like that."

"Why should I care to go there?" she answered, coloring, as she was apt to do, when conversation became personal.

"You are so much interested in mining affairs," I replied. "I have often noticed how you stop to read The Hill Beacon, no matter what you are doing. Let the mail bring that and at once everything else is dropped. See! Your very eyes confess your guilt!"

She met my accusation with as brave a front as she could command.

"Now come, Mr. Crawford," she replied. "You notice that I read that paper because you are interested in it yourself and on the lookout for it! Pray, do you notice how much I also like to get The Orchard and Meadow?"

"I am interested in the Hill Beacon," said I, "because my nephew, Jack Lewis, edits it. I am always anxious to see what fool thing he will do next. There never was a boy who so loved to stir up the wasp nest. I want to see what he will say when he is stung."

"And I," she boldly asserted, "am interested in those poor miners whom he abuses so much."

"Abuses!" I repeated. "They are a set of rascals, every one of them. An insane, law defying crew."

"They are a poor, ignorant crowd of men," said she, "and it is our duty to educate and civilize, not abuse them."

"My dear," said I, "the United States offers refuge to the oppressed, but it does not offer a free fight territory for outlaws, and that is what these men ask of us. It is the duty of their own governments to 'educate and civilize' them. We do not aspire to make our country a reformatory school."

"All that is true; but their own governments won't do it, you know, and they are here. We must do it."

"That they are here is unfortunately true," said I.

"And your nephew's paper says they ought not to have schools where their own language is used. I think that unkind. Their native tongue must be dear to them, and they naturally wish their children to know it."

"Then let them teach it to their children at home; but in the public schools of this country the language of this country is in place. How else can we educate, civilize and make good citizens of them? If they are to be part of us they should speak our language, read our books."

"They will learn English. It is in the air and they cannot help it. But it keeps the children and parents together if the children's school life is that which the parents knew. How would you like your child taught in a French school a language and a method of thought of which you were perfectly ignorant?"

"If I fled with my child to France, and expected him to be a French citizen, I think I would stand it. Jack is in the right, Miss Margaret. He makes a mistake in not conceding more than he does, but in this he is right."

"You are fond of your nephew and are blinded to his mistakes," said she stoutly.

"I hardly know him," I replied. "I never saw him but once, and that is five years ago. He is good looking."

By that time the kettle had boiled, and Hale came in with a basket of grapes, and we talked no more of the miners nor of the perplexities they presented.

But of Jack we did speak, and to the purpose before the day was over. The evening papers had come in, and Miss Woolstine had carried them off while Hale and I talked to an eminent rose culturist who had just produced a new rose of a pink that was yellow, and a yellow that was pink.

All at once I heard a little cry, and Miss Woolstine appeared at the door opening into her room. Her face was white as snow, her eyes filled with horror. I did not wait for her to speak, but at once arose and went into her little office. For a moment she stood, still looking at me.

"I cannot tell you," she whispered.

"Is it bad news—bad news for me?"

She nodded her head like a dumb person.

Now, as my wife was dead and I had no child and I knew my office was safe, my heart beat still steadily as I took her hand in mine.

"Nothing dreadful can happen to me, my child. I am so poor that Hale has little to take from me. But you—do not be afraid to tell me—my poor girl."

She looked at me still with great horror in her eyes. She turned her head back and gasped for breath; her voice was choked and she could not speak.

"Do not distress yourself so." I held her hand firmly in my own. "If the trouble is mine do not so increase it; if it is yours, let me help you bear it."

"It is Jack!" she gasped, "Jack! They have killed him! They have raided the office—they have killed him!"

Ah, I was not so poor! Fate had left me a possession—vague, not in my grasp, but still a possession, for it was Jack I had meant to know—Jack who was yet to be my son and to inherit my fortune. And so I in turn looked in horror at her.

"How do you know it?" I asked.

She pointed to the paper still in her hand. And there it was—all in headlines. A mob, an attack on The Hill Beacon, a defense, pistol shots, a dash into the office and a tearing out of all that was in it. Jack's body had been carried off by the mob.

And he was dead—the handsome, gay fellow who found life with me too slow even to try for a little! And he was my wife's nephew, and I had not tried to make the career I offered him pleasant and inviting! I sat down crushed and guilty, for at least I should have forced him to leave the miners, or cease his rating of the strikers. I could not look at Margaret. But in a moment she was kneeling by me, and she was telling me that he was not dead—no, no, not dead! "If he was dead they would not carry him away. He is alive—oh, you may be sure he is alive, and we must go at once to him. We must find him, for he must be sorely hurt, and we will have to nurse him. Come!" she said.

"Not you, my poor child," I answered. "I cannot ask this of you. But you are right. He may not be dead, yet even if he is it is my duty to go. The scoundrels! The poor boy!"

The tears shone in her dark eyes, but she did not weep. She looked at me with a ghastly smile.

"What would Jack say if you came without me? He would never believe me—never! And I—oh, do you think I could stay here? I should go mad, mad!"

"Margaret, you do not know what you say. You never knew my nephew, dear child."

She turned her head away as if in appeal. "Ask him that question. Why, he loved me. He told me that his love for me would be his death—and I laughed at that—yes, I did. I thought my fate far the hardest. But I could not tell him so. You see, the very wedding day was fixed, and I could not tell him that I loved him better than the man I was going to marry. Could I? You are his uncle, but you know I could not. Sometimes women have to listen when they cannot answer."

"I do not understand you, but you must be calmer. You must sit down. Hale, come speak to her. I do not know whether she knows what she says."

"Indeed I know very well. It was I who killed him—I! I! He was desperate. He did not care. He told me he should not care."

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

A Mechanical Harp.

Harp playing by machinery is one of the novelties. The subjection of the harp has been effected in the following manner: To begin with, it is arranged so that the plane of the strings is horizontal, the instrument lying upon a table, after the fashion of a zither. Then, as regards the written music, the notation of the traditional stave has been abandoned and sheets upon which are impressed mysterious groups of numbers are used in its stead. When one of these sheets is slid into a frame made for the purpose the meaning of the figures is interpreted.

Each of them falls under a string of the instrument, and by picking at them in numerical order with a beveled pencil of ivory the operator performs a tune. Time and phrasing are indicated by the spacing and alignment of the numbers, nor are the requirements of harmony forgotten. When the melody of the air is adjudged insufficient one of the figures is accompanied by a letter indicating that a button attached to the instrument, and bearing the same symbol, should be at this juncture pressed. This action, by bringing a small saw of ivory points into play, produces a chord suitable to the occasion.—New York Telegram.

Knows German and English.

I have heard it said that no man knows two languages equally well. I doubt that it is so. To take an illustration close at hand, I should say that the Hon. Carl Schurz knew both German and English perfectly. He writes and speaks in German constantly and in his family has made it a rule to employ his mother tongue almost exclusively, lest his children should grow up with an imperfect knowledge of its refinements or lack of facility in its use. They speak English fluently of course, and would prefer to use it in conversation among themselves. That Mr. Schurz passes safely over the pitfalls of English speech, no one who has heard him address an English speaking audience need be told, and as for his skill in writing the language, one has only to read his monograph on Abraham Lincoln to see how perfect is his mastery of the idiom. An Englishman or American might well congratulate himself on the possession of a style so easy and accomplished.—Critic.

The Law's Delay.

Lawyer—Hurrah, let me congratulate you. You are the luckiest of mortals. Thanks to my skill, I have obtained a judgment in your favor in the supreme court.

Client—After nine long years.

"But, my dear fellow, better late than never."

"How much do I get?" asked the client anxiously.

"The court decrees that you shall receive $2,000. The costs and my fee will only amount to $3,000, so all you will have to pay me is $1,000.

"Merciful heavens! and I must lose my money besides?"

"Of course you lose your money, but console yourself. You have gained your case. You can't expect to gain everything."—Texas Siftings.

Following Instructions.

Cheshire owns the stupidest man in the kingdom. He is a farm hand, and was engaged to plow a ten acre field. Wishing him to make a straight furrow, his employer directed his attention to a cow grazing right opposite, telling him to drive directly toward that cow. He started his horses, and his employer's attention was drawn to something else; but in a short time, on looking round, he found that the cow had left her place, while the sagacious plowman was following her, drawing a zigzag furrow all over the field.—London Tit-Bits.

A HERALD OF THE INFANT YEAR.

Clip the last thirty years or more from the century, and the segment will represent the term of the unbounded popularity of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The opening of the year 1894 will be signalized by the appearance of a fresh Almanac of the Bitters, in which the uses, derivation and action of this world-famous medicine will be lucidly set forth. Everybody should read it. The calendar and astronomical calculations to be found in this brochure are always astonishingly accurate, and the statistics, illustrations, humor and other reading matter rich in interest and full of profit. The Hostetter Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., publish it themselves. They employ more than sixty hands in the mechanical work, and more than eleven months in the year are consumed in its preparation. It can be obtained, without cost, of all druggists and country dealers, and is printed in English, German, French, Welsh, Norwegian, Swedish, Holland, Bohemian and Spanish.

DARKNESS.

The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the setting sun.

The mind has a thousand eyes,
But the heart but one;
Yet the light of the whole life dies
When love is done.

ONE SIDE OF A TALK.

A windy November evening closed in dark and dismal, threatening wild weather in the night. The tea things put away early, we gathered around the fire, each of us in chosen cozy corner, for a long, quiet evening, listening to the wind and the surf, half looking for a shipwrecked crew to come to us, when brisk footsteps sounded outside and our friend Robinson Crusoe bounded in, leather jacket and fishing boots dripping with rain and salt spray, his cheeks glowing and his black eyes snapping with fun.

We all started up with the same quick question of what was the matter, fancying all sorts of mishaps to his lighthouse or his dory to account for his appearance in the storm and darkness from the farther side of the always rough channel. But he seated himself serenely near the door, merely saying by way of answer: "Well, how's things over your way? Thank you, marm, I won't come no nearer the fire; I'll set ri' down here with my boots, so's not to mus yer floor up none," hanging his sleek wet fur cap on his knee to drip and to dry. "That plaguy dory of mine, she leaks like thunder. Dunno how she'll stand it, laying to your wharf in this way c' the wind, while I set. But I guess she won't damage none but what I can git acrost in her. 'Tain't only a couple o' miles anyway."

His shaggy black hair dried in a tangle as he talked, smoothed down from time to time by a hand sent aloft when not fidgeting with his buttons, or the chair, or his cap.

"I dunno how my man Friday'll get along while I'm gone. He's kinder scat o' that leetle tower o' mine, an don't he hate wuss'n pison havin me gone! By thunder! But ef he ain't old ernuf ter stay alone nights awhile I'll tell him he'd better be gettin him another job. Lord! he's forty-one, an me goin on twenty-five! An I ain't scat. Oh, he's a big fool! It's his watch till 12 tonight, anyway, an he can make the old gal go well enough if he's a mind to an don't go ter dickerin with the machinery."

There was a shade of anxiety in his tone; he rose and tiptoed heavily to the window, peering out to catch a glimpse of his faraway light.

"There she goes," he said. "She's all right. Red, ten; white, five; oh, I guess the old boy knows what he's about, but he's such an old fool, really, he don't know half the time which side his bread's buttered."

Sitting down again he stretched one leg out while he dragged up from the depths of his trousers pocket a letter wrapped in newspaper.

"I come over to see if I could borry a postage stamp," he said; then suddenly laughed aloud at his thoughts.

"Jim's so scat I didn't say a darned word how I was comin off after supper. I jest set him washin dishes, and that takes all the mind he's got, an I snuck out an let the dory fly; an when she struck the water he come a-bustin out the door on deck; thinks I'd fell overboard, ye know; and I sings out, pullin out from the tower, an the wind a blowin—I says, 'Goodby, Jim,' says I, 'I'm goin ter leave yer now;' an my Lord! he stomped int' the entry and slammed the door to. Choking mad, he was. My Lord! guess he hain't got over a-cussin yet! Allus says when I do somethin out o' common, says he, 'Deuced tomfoolery,' says he;" and Crusoe buffeted his cap in a tumult of boyish glee.

"When I git back he'll be awful glad, but he ain't a-goin ter let on, mind; he thinks I hain't got but half an eye, anyhow, an ain't never up to his tricks. But I know him, sir—marm, like a book! He'll let me haul the old dory up single handed an think he's takin his spite out that way, but, good Lord! I kin run all 'round him, as fur as tricks goes. Why, it don't take more mind than I've got in my collar button to git 'roun ole Friday. Don't mean no reel harm, nor I don't never reely hurt him, but he is sich an old fool I like to hector him some. Ef it blows a haf a puff o' wind he's scat er the tower tumblin down.

"That night it blowed so—it's two weeks come next Monday—I tell yer the old gal shook, an that's a fack. But, my gracious! she's as tight as the hair on yer head, an don't scare me none. But when we was to supper, an the seas was a-bangin an a-bustin on her, and the dishes a-rattlin, I jest hit the table leg a clip an says solemn ter Jim, I says, 'Jim, we're a goner!' an he up an down a-prayin. 'Oh, what'll we do?' says he. An I says, 'Jim,' says I, 'mebbe she'll fall to landward,' I says, an by gosh! wasn't he mad when he ketched on!

"I ben washin today. Did yer see my washin out? Washed and ironed same day. See my shirt? Ain't it clean? Can't I wash good?" he asked brightly, standing up and throwing open his jacket, beating his breast, as if we, too, might come forward if we would and smite upon his manly shirt front.

A fine deep red surged up in his weather beaten cheeks in pride of performance. "We git done terrible quick, we do. Shove the table up 'longside the stove an let her go. Hain't got but one flatiron, so I drive her awhile, an then Jim, when she's hot agin. But don't Jim make a kick, though! My Lord! Says his'n good enough ef he folds 'em an sets on 'em awhile, but I don't want no man roun me that don't iron his cloes good, an I keep him at it, an while he's jawin I jest keep to leeward an lay quiet.

"I'm a terrible good washer an ironer myself, but it's mendin gits me. I've got a hole in the heel o' this sock I've got on now, an kills me to wear a hole. An blamed ef I kin sew it up. An buttons off—can't go that neither; I've got three off'n these pants I've got on, but I can't sew 'em on. You bust your buttons off, terrible, hangin on that ole dory o' mine, up an down ev'ry time yer use her; an 'tain't 'nuff fer me to, but Jim, he's got to go a-bustin 'em off my cloes 'cos he hain't got 'nuff of his own to his back. I couldn't never learn to sew, somehow. I'll tell yer how it is—it's this way: You take a piece o' cloth, an you clap a button onto one side of it, an then you go to work an try to navigate through from t'other side with a needle, an ef you don't stave the point off ev'ry single time I'll swaller it!

"Old lady down to Moose island, where I come from, last winter's done my button sewing for two years back, an comes kinder rough on me doing of it myself. Jim hed oughter to know how to sew, didn't he now? But he don't. I says to him sometimes, 'Jim,' I says, 'you'd orter be ashamed, big ez you be an can't sew.' But don't do no good, only makes him madder 'n a settin hen. Allus does when I get foul er any o' his lacks. But he's a good feller, Jim is, ony he ain't never been brought up right. It makes a lot o' difference to a feller whether he's been brought up."

Friday's critic was spread out at comfortable length in his chair, worrying his fur cap tirelessly as he talked.

"I don't mean that kind o' fetchin up the big bugs set out to have," he explained, warming up to a new idea. "My gracious! there's one or two houses I go into sometimes, summer folks down to Moose island, in town for winters. I ben to 'em. I know how they done! Yer can't tell me! Why, I 'gwin there awhile an seems ez ef I should dwup thro' the ruf, makes me so deuced oncomfortable. So stan up an p'ticler them kind o' folks is, yer can't fetch a step but what yer come down on some er their notions. Good Lord! in some of them rixtocratic houses yer have ter split a bean t' eat it. Ef I want sum'n t' eat I druther eat off'n the floor than be so awful slow and mannery. Now, I like to come over here, yer don't have ter act anyhow.

"Now, I'll tell yer, did yer ever notice," (balancing his cap on one fist and beating it around and around with the other) "it's jest this way—sometimes yer have an awful sight better time when it don't cost nothin than ye do when it does. That's what's the matter. Now I'll tell yer. I set out to go to Yarmouth on a Sunday to see my cousin, Maria Collins, an so I staid over till Monday. Well, I'll be blamed ef I ever hed a better time in my life; an do ye believe, the whole thing didn't cost fifteen cents. Nor I couldn't tell ter save me what I done, only set roun an laffed, an I dunno what I was laff'n at. Maria's a tearer and she makes things hum—an so's her children. Terrible nice children.

"I've ben places where I'd git rid of fifteen dollars an wisht all the whole time I hadn't went. There's lots o' things you pay for that's poor investments, I say—'specially parties and presents. Now I'll tell yer. I went to a party down to Moose Neck, an me an nother feller we laid out five dollars for the two of us, an blamed if it warn't a clean fizzle. My boots was too small, pinched awful, an there was too many girls. Ef there's one thing I hate, it's too many girls at a party. An I hain't went to another party since. An just see what I laid out, now, compared to Maria's, an didn't get no lastin satisfaction!

"I guess I'll be goin now. Jim he'll be cussin an jawin an lookin out the door ev'ry little while t' see ef I'm comin, but soon ez I heave in sight under them tower steps, he'll in and slam the door an make believe not know I'm aroun. Oh, he's a sly one, Jim is. Well, good night; I guess I'll be goin. Hope to see you over to my house, some o' these nice nights. Well, I made a visit, hain't I, this time! Ef ye stan up it's a call, an ef ye set down it's a visit. Well, I guess I'll be goin. Good night!"

A Fortunate Greenhorn.

"When I came to this country," said a merchant recently, "I was a lad fresh from old Ireland. My first home was with friends in Cambridge. In one of my walks, before I had been here a week, I came across a queer, old fashioned house that interested me immensely. I described it to my friends, and learned that it was the home of the poet Longfellow. That increased my interest.

"The next day I went again to the queer house and stood gawkily looking at it and at an old gentleman sitting in the yard. I stared so long that the old gentleman noticed it, and coming to the fence asked me what I was looking at. I told him that I wanted to see the man who lived there, because I had read his works in the schools of Ireland.

"The old gentleman asked me what I knew about Longfellow's writings, and I told him I knew enough about one poem to repeat every word of it.

"When he heard that he asked me to come into the house and recite the poem to him. I went in and repeated 'The Village Blacksmith' without making a mistake. That pleased my listener, and putting on his hat he asked me to walk with him. He said that I should have something that many people had asked for and tried in vain to get.

"He stopped under a big tree and said: 'This is the tree under which that poem you recited was written. The village smithy was under this tree.'

"Then the aged poet marched up and with his own hand broke off a branch of that famous tree and gave it to me."—Boston Herald.

Cups Used by Tea Tasters.

The teacups used by tea merchants in tasting tea are made especially for the purpose of the finest French china and have no handles or saucers. The teas are carefully weighed out and placed in the cups, when boiling water is poured on them. Tea tasters nowadays depend more upon the odor than the taste of teas and some of the most expert do not taste them at all, but rely entirely upon smelling them. — Philadelphia Ledger.

TRICKY BOLIVAR.

The Remarkable Performance of a Cunning Old Bear.

ESCAPING A CROWD OF SPORTSMEN.

Clever Bruin Left Tracks in the Snow by Which an Unpopular Hunter Nearly Lost His Life.

"I was always a little shy of condemning a man on circumstantial evidence," said Colonel Jim Coryel, of Pulteney, who attended a meeting of the Fairchild house circle the other evening, "and since the day that I had a certain little experience out in Kitson county, Minn., a year or so ago, I have been still more disinclined to accept evidence of that kind as conclusive. One day a friend of mine who was with me ran across what he said was a bear almost as big as any two he had ever seen, and on his mentioning the fact in camp our guide became very much excited and declared that the bear was one known to all that country as Tricky Bolivar. He had outwitted every hunter in Kitson county for ten years, and some fellow down in St. Paul had a standing offer of fifty dollars for the smart old cuss' hide.

"'Why,' said the excited guide, 'there's been tons of ammunition wasted on old Bolivar, and what in the world he has done with all the traps he has carried away, year after year, is something it would be worth a good deal to know. They'd be worth a year's wages in old iron alone.'

"I became interested in this wonderful bear at once, and concluded that I could afford to let the moose alone for one day anyhow, for the chance of bagging Tricky Bolivar. There would be fun trying to circumvent an animal as able as this one was cracked up to be, and so we started out to give him a whirl.

"There was a hunter out there named Caleb Cripps, and he was a man of such disagreeable ways and questionable methods in the woods that nobody would hunt with him. He was terribly unpopular, and every hunter in the county was in a perpetual state of worriment for fear that Caleb might some day strike the great luck of gathering in old Bolivar. No matter who else might be the fortunate man to capture the prize bear, his success would make everybody else glad, but if Caleb Cripps should happen to be the man there would be universal disgust and gritting of teeth in Kitson county, every hunter said. Caleb had a cabin two or three miles from us, but we had never run across him until the day we went out on the hunt for Tricky Bolivar.

"The guide told us another peculiar thing about this smart bear and the hunters. As anxious as they all were to kill Bolivar, there was a strict rule of etiquette among them. If one hunter got on the trail of a bear no other hunter interfered with him or joined in the chase, unless requested to, the idea being that the one who started first should have all the honor and credit of bagging Bolivar if he could. This was a well understood and sacred rule with the hunters, and none of them would have thought of breaking it any sooner than he would have thought of burning a fellow hunter's cabin.

"'Unless it might be Caleb Cripps,' said our guide. 'He'd do it in a minute.'

"We got a track of the bear in the snow a mile from our cabin, and the track was fresh. We followed it for two miles.

"We followed the trail for an hour, but never got as much as a sight of the bear. By and by it led into an open country, and a half mile further on it made straight toward Caleb Cripps' cabin. This made the guide uneasy, and when it took us within three feet of Caleb's door and the bear tracks went no further, the guide laid right down and howled, he was so mad. The bear tracks went no further than the cabin, but from the cabin the footprints of two men, side by side, led away toward the settlement, three miles away.

"'That infernal Cale Cripps has gobbled old Bolivar!' yelled the guide. 'He's gone and cut back to his cabin, and the bear happenin to come along this way, he's plinged it, and him and his brother Joe is luggin him in to the settlement! We might jist as well quit now! I'll shoot that miserable cur, Cale Cripps, the first time I set eyes on him!'

"The guide was still raging and making things blue around there, when who should come along but Cripps himself. Our guide jumped for his gun, and if I hadn't grabbed him I guess he'd have put a ball in the unpopular hunter there and then.

"'You can't fool me, Cale Cripps!' the guide yelled. 'You've killed our bear. It'll be the last one you'll kill in this county, and'——

"Cripps had been looking at the tracks that led away from his cabin while the guide was howling, and the way he dashed into the cabin, the door being open, cut the guide's remarks short. Cripps wasn't inside more than five seconds. Then he dashed out again.

"'Both pair is gone, by the Great Horns!' he hollered. 'And they cost me ten dollars.'

"'Come on!' shouted the guide, and he started after Caleb, and we followed the guide. The trail circled around toward a big swamp that lay to the right about two miles, and we tore along on it like mad, no one speaking a word. I never was so puzzled in my life. Just as we reached the swamp we heard the report of a rifle on ahead, quickly followed by another. Then there arose the wildest kind of shouts in the swamp, and as we went in we saw two hunters dancing and yelling around the carcass of an immense bear that lay in the snow. The hunters discovered us.

"'We've got him!' they shouted. 'We've gathered in Tricky Bolivar at last.'

"We hurried in, Cale Cripps in the lead.

"'There they be!' Caleb hollered. 'I know'd it. There they be!'

"With that Caleb dropped down in the snow by the side of the bear and made a grab for one of his feet. Then we discovered that the bear had a boot on each one of his four feet.

"'The cunnin old cuss!' exclaimed our guide. 'It's like murder killin that bear.'

"What did it mean? Why, Tricky Bolivar, seeing that we were pressing him close, had seen the door of Caleb Cripps' cabin open and jumped inside. When he came out again he made bear tracks no more, for he had put on two pair of Caleb's hunting boots and marching ahead had left the trail of two hunters in the snow instead of his own. He threw us completely off, and if Caleb Cripps hadn't come up just as he did and the two hunters hadn't happened to be in the swamp when old Bolivar was making for it, nothing could ever have convinced Kitson county that Caleb hadn't violated sacred etiquette and killed the bear he knew we were after, and there is no telling what the consequences would have been to him. So that is why I am shyer than ever of circumstantial evidence, and that is why, also, I believe there never was a smarter bear than Tricky Bolivar, of Kitson county."—New York Sun.

The Artists' Smiling Model.

An Indianapolis artist who has won prestige in eastern art circles tells the following incident which occurred in a New York studio of much celebrity: A large class of women and girls were sketching from a seminude model, a young Italian, who was posed with his head thrown back, his arms fantastically wreathed over his head, and his legs extended in some sort of wild Bacchanalian caper. The Indianapolis woman was sketching the model's shoulder when she observed that he was smiling at her in a very familiar manner. Somewhat disconcerted to discover that she had apparently made a conquest of this guileless child of Italia, she began to sketch his knee, as more remote from the artillery of his sentimental glances. In a remote corner of the room giggling arose, and she perceived that the smiles of the flirtatious model were taking effect upon some lively girls among the students. They subsided shortly, but the young Italian still contined firing off smiling glances in every direction.

At about the center of the class was a German girl, serious to the core, absorbed in her work and fierce in manner as a female Bismarck. Every stroke she planted on her easel was decisive and almost combative. Suddenly she came under the battery of the Italian's smiles, and without an instant's hesitation her voice rang out like a clarion:

"You schtop dat schmiling. Ve don't vant you to schmile."

The figure of the model relaxed instantaneously, and he stood straight as an arrow before the class, the impersonation of offended and wrathful dignity. After an appalling silence he remarked in the severest tones:

"Ladies, I am here before you zimply as ze model of ze 'Dancing Fawn.' Ze smile goes wiz ze pose."—Indianapolis Journal.

The Legend of Standing Rock.

While on the trip through North Dakota Inspector Watkins was told by the Indian agent at Standing Rock agency the legend of the stone from which the place gets its name.

Years ago, according to the Indian tradition, a buck and his squaw were on a journey down the Missouri river to visit some relatives at a distant point. Where Fort Yates now is the buck saw a young squaw of surprising beauty, with whom he fell desperately in love. In spite of the tears and entreaties of his lawful wife, he refused to proceed on the journey or in any other direction, but resolved to stay right there. The deserted squaw exhausted her entreaties and her tears and finally arose to leave the place alone. As she did so she stepped back in the spot where she had been sitting and turned to stone. There she has remained ever since, a standing reproach to her faithless lord and master to all his kind. By a faint stretch of the imagination the standing rock from which the agency gets its name can be made to take the outlines of a woman.

The Indians believe the story and pay homage to the monument of man's perfidy and fickleness and woman's constancy. While the inspector was at Fort Yates he saw an Indian approach the rock, bow reverently and lay something at its base. When the Indian had gone the inspector and the agent went out to see what the offering was. It was a chew of tobacco, no heavy sacrifice it might be said but perpaps it was the last the Indian had.—Helena Independent.

Didn't Need Sympathy.

A Tammany brave caused a flurry in the treasury department a day or two ago by ingeniously circumventing one of the cast iron regulations provided for the clerks in Uncle Sam's big beehive. One of the rules most strictly enforced is that no employee can be seen by outsiders during business hours, "except in case of sickness or death." The Tammanyite was very anxious to see a friend before returning to New York, and, upon being informed of the rule, was for a moment at a loss how to proceed. Suddenly a bright idea struck him. "Please say to the chief of division," he said to the doorkeeper, in a plaintive tone, "that I want to see Brown very much. My grandfather is dead."

The doorkeeper performed the errand with alacrity, and Brown speedily appeared and shook the Tammanyite's hand with much sympathy. "I am very sorry, old man, to hear of your grandfather's death," he said. "I know that sympathy don't amount to much on these occasions, but I am really very much pained." "Oh, that's all right," responded the New Yorker; "the old man died about twenty years ago. Come out; I want to talk to you."—Washington Cor. New York World.

Two Ways of Saying a Thing.

The ancient Greeks had a phrase which they used in salutation—"Act successfully." So much of our speech is commonplace or severely practical that we welcome any innovation that redeems it from monotony. It is a long step from the classic Greek to the descendant of a Virginia field hand as represented by my colored washwoman.

"I used to know some colored folks," she said, "who went to Chicago ter live. They were good people when they got there, but they may be worse yet."

Now this, told in her roundabout way, was as clear to an intelligent mind as the two crisp words of our Greek friends, who had in their day a habit of fining people for saying in three words what they could have expressed in two. In each case it is the departure from a common form that lends interest to the words.—Mrs. M. L. Rayne in Detroit Free Press.

When the Eyes Stick.

Inflammation of the conjunctiva or membrane, which shields the front of the eyeball from the air and takes the rub of the eyelids, is indicated by the glued state of the eyes in the morning, and more especially by their bloodshot condition, the vessels being bright red in color and winding about in great irregularity, with no discernible order or plan.—Hall's Journal of Health.

A Thankless Profession.

Widower—Doctor, your bill is something outrageous. Here you have just doctored my poor wife to death and now you bring in a bill like this.

Doctor—That's just what I expected, you fellows always kick. I don't believe that there's a bit of gratitude left in this world. —Westfield (N. J.) Leader.

A MAN OF IDEAS.

He is Always Doing Something to Lighten the Burdens of Mankind.

TWO EVENINGS WITH AN INVENTOR.

A Story That Shows What a Terrible Affliction the Disease of Unprofitable Ingenuity May be.

Had it not been that my family went out of town a short time ago and left me homeless and despondent, I would never have been able to write this story. As it was I was won over by the entreaties of a friend and went to live with him and his little family—for awhile.

It pleases me to meet geniuses. I like to touch shoulders with men of ideas, and that is just what this friend of mine might be labeled—a man of ideas. I did not know it before I went to his house, but then I discovered he is an inventor.

What he invents is immaterial; suffice it to say he invents in the full sense of the word. If he works out an idea, and when the model is perfected it doesn't do what he thought it would, he makes it do something else.

It's a double back action style of inventing that is destined to fill long felt wants or leave an aching void. The inventor is not to blame for either of these happenings, his business being exclusively to invent.

We were sitting in his dining room the first evening I was at his house. The servant had just cleared the dinner table, and my friend's wife was looking after the youngsters and keeping their nurse out of mischief.

George was looking intently at one of the gas tips, and his brain machinery was grinding exceeding fine material, I could see.

"Well, what is it?" I asked, looking up and around for a stray June bug or some other bird of plumage.

"I'm just thinking," George said rather dreamily, "I can improve on that gas tip. I'll do it. I've got it sure." Then he began drawing things on a piece of paper that looked like deformed church steeples. He said they were gas tips.

For a day or two George ate very little. I afterward learned this is common with inventors, as they are able to go for weeks at a time without touching a morsel. Their brains stop working when their owner eats. There's no money in eating except for the dealers in edibles.

When George came back to earth and food, he had a model in his pocket. It was the tangible outcome of his thinking.

"Isn't that splendid?" he said, with ecstasy, holding it up before me. His black eyes glistened.

"Yes, it's very pretty," I replied. "Will it work?"

"You bet it'll work. The user will get a large and steady flame, with no waste of gas and with one-third the usual pressure. I'll show you."

George got up and adjusted it to the chandelier. He got out matches and then turned out the remaining gas jet. Fully 14 matches were struck while we sat in the dark. I held my breath because my hold on solemnity befitting the occasion was fast loosing.

He said many things which I could not be led to repeat. The sanctity of a private home should not be invaded. It was his right to say things, as he paid the rent.

The thing did not work. I could see that, even though it was dark. He relighted the gas and sat down. You can never tell what an inventor is going to do, so I said nothing. Oh, I believe I did ask him if there was an opening in the end for the gas to ooze through. I'm not sure, though, but I know George didn't answer.

He finally secured a couple of feet of small rubber hose that he had used in another experiment and fastened the gas tip on one end. He thought perhaps there was an obstruction that water would clear away. The other end of the hose he attached to a faucet.

I stood by like any well behaved invited guest. George turned the water, and it shot through in first rate shape. The fact was the gas tip was a splendid sprinkler. Even George's wife acknowledged that, and she gave up acknowledging anything but his inventive failures years ago.

"By gracious!" George exclaimed, "isn't that a dandy sprinkler? I'll get that patented." Then he laid it down.

It was the next evening George's wife said that her expensive music box was out of order and would not play. The valuable instrument was put on the table, and George peered into it for about five minutes.

"No wonder; I see what's the matter," George remarked as he left the room. He returned with four or five implements that for all I know belonged to a kitchen range.

He unfastened a couple of screws and then—yes, and then! The case was full of snarled up springs, things that looked like comb teeth and various odds and ends that one would never suspect having been within 10 miles of the house a minute before. Tears ran down the cheeks of George's wife and dropped in on the cylinders.

"What are you trying to do—spoil and rust the works?" George asked. Then he dickered and dickered until he had about a bushel of pieces of machinery strewn about. George's wife retired, and I fell asleep on a lounge. My host worked until 6 o'clock in the morning and then gave it up.

I left the next day. It was impossible for me to remain longer in the house with George's inventive brain. It fairly crowded me out. The music box is now in Geneva being fixed, the gas tip sprinkler keeps papers from flying about, and George is working on something that can be used as a self adjusting car coupler or a seltzer water siphon.

Saving that when you knock him on the head a fish quivers as terribly as a man in extreme agony, we know nothing about the sensibility of fish.

Tennyson's Indignation.

Lord Tennyson is said to be greatly angered at the book in which Mr. Churton Collins seems, at any rate, to bring against him a charge of plagiarism. This is a charge which has always had the most irritating effect upon the poet, and most people will probably agree that a book like Mr. Collins' is probably best postponed until the author with whose work it deals is beyond the feeling of resentment. We are confident that the greater number of the critics who today deal so cavalierly with Virgil, Homer, Horace and the other great immortals, would abstain if their victims were still in the land of the living.

And in this case the matter is made worse by the fact that Lord Tennyson has been at special pains to show his feelings in regard to any charges of the kind. "These writers," he said to a friend, on the occasion when he was last made the subject of this charge, "these writers are the lice on the locks of literature," showing that even in his wrath a poet does not forget to use "alliteration's artful aid."

Nor is this anger remarkable when it is remembered on what passages the would be accuser fixed in order to prove the truth of his indictment. Poor Tennyson was not allowed to say "Ring the bells" without being accused of having borrowed from Sir Philip Sidney, or to apply to the ocean the verb "roar" without being told that he had plaigarized from Homer! And when he described a waterfall in the well known line, "Slow dropping veils of thinnest lawn," he was immediately charged by a critic with having borrowed the metaphor from the lawn used in theaters to imitate a waterfall! Imagine the feelings of a faithful artist who had studied the effect before a waterfall in the Pyrenees!—Bookman.

The Widow Watson's Wooing.

Leap year has been inaugurated in the town of Egerton, Kan., by a well to do widow who took a liking to a young farm hand employed in the neighborhood. Mrs. Mary Watson owns a fine farm, and she has been recognized as a strongminded woman. Her husband died about five years ago and left her about $20,000.

About a week ago she came to town to market and met John Northrup, who works on a farm about two miles beyond the farm of Mrs. Watson. Mrs. Watson had never seen the young man before, but appeared to be much taken with his appearance, and asked to be made acquainted with him.

The young man was not astonished at the request, but was much surprised when she told him, after knowing him about half an hour, that she wanted a husband and if he was willing she thought they would do well together as man and wife. He was a little taken aback at the suddenness of the offer, but he concluded he could do no better and accepted without any shyness. They got the necessary license and were made man and wife.—Cor. The Dates of Easter.

It has been over 1,500 years since the rule was adopted which makes Easter the first Sunday after the first full moon after the sun crosses the line. By this arrangement of things Easter may come as early as March 22 or as late as April 25. I have compiled the following facts concerning the days of the month upon which it has fallen from 1803 to 1891, inclusive. In looking over the dates I have been struck by the variety of days represented, which include every one in the month of April except the last five.

Since 1803 it has occurred three times on the 19th, five times on the 16th, five times on the 1st, four times each on the 2d, 11th and 12th, four times on March 31, four times on April 6, three times on the 4th, 5th, 7th, 8th, 10th, 13th, 14th and 22d of April, and 27th and 28th of March. March 22, 1818, was the earliest date upon which it has occurred. Nine days in March are represented, viz., 22d, 23d, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th and 31st.—St. Louis Republic.

Cheap Telephones.

The natural inquiry arises what will telephones cost when their manufacture is free, and what will be the expense of equipping a private line? It is scarcely necessary to go into detailed estimates at this juncture, especially as the cost must necessarily vary with the conditions, such as the class of work required, the finish of the instrument and so on. A telephone that will speak can be made for very little, and small instruments for household work need cost no more than electric bells of the same quality and finish.

Some years ago I put in a large hotel in Spain an installation of electric bells and telephones; the telephones were in the form of ordinary push buttons; you pressed the button and then pulled the wooden case from the clamp which held it to the base fixed to the wall and spoke into the back of the push, which contained a telephone of the ordinary pattern with a very short magnet. The cost of these instruments was very small. —Engineering Magazine.

Two Marvelous Escapes.

In the space of two minutes John Swanson, of Omaha, had two almost miraculous escapes from death. He was standing near a quarry when a keg of powder exploded and hurled him a considerable distance from the spot. In a senseless condition he landed just above a charge of dynamite, the fuse of which had already been lighted. Before he could be rescued the dynamite exploded, and Swanson was blown a second time into the air. Notwithstanding this double accident the man escaped with only a broken leg and arm.—Yankee Blade.

FOOD FOR MEN.

What Some Brain Workers Eat in Order to do Good Work.

SET RULES CANNOT BE FOLLOWED.

Individual Peculiarities Must Determine the Particular Food Needed for Each One.

Whether the old saying that a man's heart is reached through his stomach is or is not a true one, it is a scientific fact that the stomach is a highway to the brain. The exhilarating influence of a good dinner is sometimes shown in brilliant impromptu speeches, without a doubt. The cook is responsible for many of the accidents, the failures and successes of life. Not long ago a well known lawyer in summing up a case acquitted himself so wretchedly that the jury promptly brought in a verdict against his client. The lawyer afterward acknowledged that hot muffins at breakfast were responsible for his having lost the case. They made him irritable and insolent.

Curious to know upon what sort of food men of note do their best work, I recently interviewed some of the lights of the medical profession, law, commerce, theology and society.

Genial Dr. George F. Shrady, President Grant's stanch friend, declares that he must vary his food in order to develop and nourish, separately and collectively, the organs of his body.

"I have an excellent digestion and can take all kinds of food without feeling any discomfort," said he, "but I believe that the brain is most nurtured by sleep and rest. If we gratify our intellectual tastes we are feeding the brain vastly better than by any sort of material food, and consequently obtain better results.

"A friend once had as a patient a young author, who had been recommended to follow a strict diet of pumpkins. On this sort of fare he wrote a novel. Well, the offspring of pumpkins—roasted, boiled and stewed—is still looking for a publisher to launch it on an unsuspecting public!

"No one kind of food exclusively is good for the ordinary man. 'To be healthy, wealthy and wise,' as the old maxim goes, study the likes and dislikes of your stomach and regulate your diet accordingly (as I do) and all will go well."

Judge Roger A. Pryor laughed heartily when told that every briefless lawyer in town was anxious to know whether his spirited speeches might be attributed to squab, lobster or partridge.

"Tell them from me," said Judge Pryor, "that I am extremely fond of birds and dainties generally and that lobster a la Newburg is a toothsome dish I don't despise and that my brain works best when I'm free from indigestion. Tell these young men to follow the old Roman maxim and secure for themselves 'a sound mind in a sound body.'

"Hot breads, salads, ices and sweets form part of my daily menu, and as they give my body strength I am able to do my allotted share of mental labor. The body must first be ministered to by food and exercise, and then the mind will soon be ripe for cultivation. The reason, memory and imagination must each be nourished with the food it requires—logic, law, mathematics, poetry or art. Upon the idiosyncracies and constitutional peculiarities of each man depend the kind of food he assimilates."

"Look at the enormous sale of phosphates and so called brain foods," said he. "There is nothing in them. If instead of wondering whether this, that or the other is good for him a man would simply follow the dictates of his own appetite we would be much better off. Nature places a safeguard upon excess by creating the sensation of satiety.

"When I have eaten some rich food that causes me some annoyance I take a horseback ride or other pleasant exercise and rid myself of the ill feeling, and in the future avoid that Welsh rarebit or venison that caused the trouble. Rest is really the best tonic for the brain. In two words I would give this prescription for happiness—'Avoid worry.'"

A prominent member of Sorosis, a really brainy woman, declares that the amount of food people require or think they require is largely a matter of habit. Said she: "It is possible to train the stomach to do with very little or to make its requirements border on the margin of gluttony. When the hunger is satisfied, brain achievements depend upon heredity and environment, and to them must be attributed all success or failure. The gardener who only cares for the blossom of his plant instead of directing his efforts to the root, will have but sorry fruit as a reward. Let mankind look to their physical perfection, and the mental and moral are sure to follow."

The Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke, the author and clergyman, believes the brain to be touchingly appreciative of all kindness shown to the stomach, and sullen and unmanageable when the latter is oppressed. At the same time allowance must be made for individual tastes.

"My food," he said, "must be taken at regular intervals and be largely of the farinaceous kind, while yours, possibly, may be taken when and as you chose. A single sandwich of caviar would incapacitate me for several hours. So, I say, be kind to the machinery of the body. After all, the best diet for the brain is a constant variety in the quality and quantity of our intellectual food."

There seems to be no particular edible which holds a magic power over the realm of thought but by selecting food with a view to digestibility. In individual cases the body is aided in performing its various functions, and the brain, with its other organs, is thus enabled to discharge its duties properly as well.—New York Herald.

Agricultural chemists estimate the nutriment of 100 pounds of cotton seed meal as equal to 318 pounds of corn or to 767 pounds of wheat bran.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2 1894

The State Board of Prison Directors has adopted Mr. Sonntag's resolution hereafter to keep all prisoners who are sentenced for garroting and such crimes the first year of their term in solitary confinement on two meals a day and with only as much exercise as the physician may direct. This is a measure that will be generally approved. If those men are sentenced to terms long enough, the reformatory method may be put into operation on them during the other years of their incarceration. As the prisons have been managed, and are yet, there is precious little punishment for crime in our penal system, and less reformation of criminals. The first demand of society is that it shall not be afflicted with the activities of convicts after they are once put behind the bars. In this respect society is not getting the protection it desires and pays for, but the Sonntag resolution is calculated to improve the situation some, and therefore it is welcomed as a needed reform.

The income tax is opposed because it cannot be collected. We have failed in every shape to collect taxes from the rich. Is this an argument against trying to do so any more? The federal scheme of taxation is so fixed that the rich escape almost entirely, and for State and county taxes they do not pay ten per cent of what the poor or the merely well to do people have to pay. That is a million dollars in the hands of one man does not pay more than a hundred thousand in the hands of ten men. Now because this is a fact shall we tell the millionaire to go scott free? We admit that we had almost as well do it; but somehow we do hate to get right down and affirm that the more a man needs the protection of the law the less he shall pay therefor. In the Federal scheme these well to do people not only pay all the actual taxes, but pay hundreds of millions a year to trusts and corporations; pay toward making other millionaires to escape taxation. That scheme is robbery so bold, so monstrous, that it is a wonder it could exist for a day.

The outlook in Los Angeles never was more encouraging. Our city is filled with visitors, a large number of whom are looking around for investments. Real estate in the city is in demand, but the would-be buyers are not so active as they will be in a month or so, when they realize that holders are stiffening in their prices. Everything betokens an unusually prosperous year for this section. The season so far has been one of the best for farmers we have ever had. The acreage of grain planted far surpass that of last year, and the harvest, according to the present outlook, will be the most abundant ever reaped in Southern California. The orange crop is unusually large, and is being marketed at satisfactory prices. As the Nevada Southern railroad progresses towards Utah, our back country trade is increasing. Take the whole situation into consideration, we are in a far better condition than any other city on the Pacific Coast—L. A. Herald.

Ben Harrison is coming out to this coast again. This time as a private citizen and not as President. He will not be worried as he was before. Every man of every party felt bound to help do honor to the President of the United States, and Mr. Harrison mistook that feeling for personal homage, and he swelled up so big that the State would not hold him. The Oakland school children, who were so anxious to see a real live President, and to whom he gave the dodge, will not now care anything about him. Should he pass the house they would not raise their eyes to the window. It is hard for a man to realize this vast difference, and especially so to one who failed, as Harrison did, to separate his personality from the office.

The crowd who nightly applaud the play in which the family of Chris Evans appear and wherein the robber and murderer's exploits are represented cannot be classed as civilized. A man to whom Chris Evans seems a hero needs but opportunity and courage to become a criminal like him.

Ordinance No. 50.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every male person over twenty-one and under fifty five years of age, found in each Road District of the County of Inyo, State of California, between the first day of March, 1894, and the thirty first day of December, 1894, excepting all persons who were honorably discharged from service in the army or navy of the United States, at any time between the first day of April, in the year A. D. 1861, and the first day of September, A. D. 1865, and who have not paid the same in some other road district, must pay to the said County of Inyo, a road poll tax of two dollars.

SECTION 2. Said road poll tax shall be collected by the Assessor of the said County of Inyo, in the same manner that State Poll Taxes are collected, and shall be paid to the Treasurer of the said County of Inyo and shall be placed to the credit of the several road districts of the said County of Inyo from which said road poll tax was collected.

SECTION 3. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and Ordinance No. 46 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 9th day of January, 1893, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances and parts of Ordinances of said Board in conflict here with are hereby repealed.

SECTION 4. This Ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said County of Inyo, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

Ordinance No. 51.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep in the County of Inyo, State of California, must annually procure a license therefor from the Tax Collector of said Inyo County, and must make therefor the following payment:

1. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five thousand sheep or more shall constitute the first class, and must pay Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars per annum for the first five thousand sheep, and for every additional thousand sheep the sum of Fifty Dollars per annum.

2. Those owning and having in their possession and under their control four thousand sheep and less than five thousand constitute the second class, and must pay Two Hundred Dollars per annum.

3. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand five hundred sheep and less than four thousand constitute the third class and must pay One Hundred and seventy-five Dollars per annum.

4. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand sheep and less than three thousand five hundred constitute the fourth class and must pay One Hundred and fifty Dollars per annum.

5. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand five hundred sheep and less than three thousand constitute the fifth class and must pay One Hundred and twenty-five Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand sheep and less than two thousand five hundred constitute the sixth class and must pay One Hundred Dollars per annum.

7. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand five hundred sheep and less than two thousand constitute the seventh class and must pay Seventy-five Dollars per annum.

8. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand sheep and less than one thousand five hundred constitute the eighth class, and must pay Fifty Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five hundred sheep and less than one thousand constitute the ninth class and must pay Twenty-five dollars per annum.

10. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control a less number than five hundred sheep constitute the tenth class, and must pay Twelve Dollars and fifty cents per annum.

SECTION 2. The license provided for by this ordinance shall be deemed a debt due the said County of Inyo, and the Tax-Collector of the said Inyo County shall have the collection of said license, and it is hereby made his duty to collect the same, and any person required to take out a license under the provisions of this ordinance, who fails or neglects, or refuses to take out such license, the said Tax-Collector may direct suit to be brought in the name of the County of Inyo as plaintiff, for the recovery of said license and in such case either the Tax Collector or the attorney for the said plaintiff in said suit may make the necessary affidavit for, and a writ of attachment may issue without any bond being given on behalf of the plaintiff, and in case of recovery by the said plaintiff, fifty dollars damages must be added to the judgment and costs, to be collected from the defendant.

SECTION 3. The County Auditor of said Inyo County shall prepare and have printed, suitable blank licenses for the said Tax Collector to carry out the provisions of this ordinance, with a blank receipt attached, for the signature of the Tax-Collector, when sold.

SECTION 4. The said Tax Collector shall collector a fee of one dollar for each license sold which shall be paid into the Salary fund of the said Inyo County.

SECTION 5. All moneys collected for licenses under the provisions of this ordinance shall be paid over to the County Treasurer of said Inyo County as other moneys, and shall be placed to the credit of the Salary fund of said County.

SECTION 6. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and ordinance No. 41 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 7th day of January, 1892, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances or parts of ordinances of said Board, in conflict herewith, are each and all of them hereby repealed.

SECTION 7. This ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said Inyo County, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

MARRIED.

ESCALLON—LOVE—At Independence, January 29th, by Rev. S. W. Albone, John Escallon and Mrs. Sarah E. Love.

Bar silver, 66¾.

P. Labarge was up from Lone Pine yesterday.

The trials of Islay and others are set for next Tuesday.

Wm. Rowan was down from Bishop early in the week.

Robt. O'Neal was down from Bishop early in the week.

See the assessment notice of the Lone Pine Canal Company.

Don't forget that Big Pine will celebrate Washington's Birthday.

Mrs. F. Rhine is expected to arrive from San Francisco next week.

Hon. P. Reddy was at Hawthorne last week on legal business.

W. J. Lake is clerking for A. W. Eibeshutz during the latters absence.

Mrs. Lewis has just about completed a fine new residence at Camp Independence.

Angus McDonald and Wm. McDonald were down from Big Pine early in the week.

Charley Collins is tearing up the earth at a lively rate along the line of the new canal.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz left for San Francisco yesterday morning to be gone about a month.

A. Walker came up from Olancha last Sunday. He visited Bishop on his trip, returning home yesterday.

The Meads Bros. arrived at Independence yesterday on their way to Mojave. They have on a load of hides.

Murphy has been busy of late turning out single- and double-trees to be used in the construction of the big canal.

Rosina Vokes died at her home in London last week. For twenty years she was a favorite actress in two continents.

Sheriff Gorman will collect sheep license tax this year. He will use every effort to secure a full payment of the license.

Mrs. J. J. Gunn came in from Modock last week and is visiting with relatives and friends at Independence and vicinity.

The Board of Education will meet at Independence on Monday, February 19th. See notice of the County Superintendent.

So far this has been a good winter for stockmen. There has been no rain to rot the dry feed, and range cattle are looking fine.

Will Yaney came down from Bishop last Monday, bringing with him twenty-four head of horses to put to work on the big canal,

Owing to the amount of dental work he still has on hand at Independence Dr. Mc Queen will not go to Lone Pine until Monday.

Bert Rhine arrived home last Tuesday from Bakersfield. While absent he purchased 1500 ewes at Selma, which he will bring to the Valley later on.

J. D. Mairs arrived home yesterday morning from a visit to Los Angeles and neighboring cities. Like everybody else, Jerry is glad to get back to Inyo.

Mrs. Martha Yandell and family have removed to their former home at Bishop after a residence of three years at Independence. They left on Wednesday.

John Keegan has leased a piece of ground from Mrs. Lewis at Camp Independence and will put in an extensive vegetable garden during the coming season.

Monday's Post in a lengthy editorial proceeds to make things warm for Viscompte Cornely. It says that he is accused of stealing, and that such a scoundrel is a big blot on the Midwinter fair.

Under-Sheriff Holland has been out during the week summonsing jurors and witnesses for the trials of Islay, Hughes, Jonse and Payne in the Superior Court next week.

Send On Your Exhibits.

The committee appointed at Big Pine to solicit subscriptions for the Midwinter fair sent down $72 last Monday. Yesterday $28 was forwarded from Lone Pine. The executive committee now has about $600 on hand for the purpose of defraying the expenses of an exhibit at the Midwinter fair, besides the requisite amount of space being already secured. It now remains for the farmers of Owens Valley to come forwith their exhibits. There will be no expense to exhibitors beyond the trouble of making the collection. All articles will be forwarded by the committee free of charge. The large map of Inyo County has been completed and was expected to be sent yesterday. A pamphlet descriptive of the county will be published for free distribution. It is earnestly hoped that the farmers will not neglect this opportunity for benefiting themselves and the entire county. Select such samples of grain, hay, potatoes, onions and other general produce as you have and forward them to the committee at Independence. The earlier this is done the better, as it will be that much longer time on exhibition.

Supreme Court Decision.

The Supreme Court, on the 17th instant, handed down its decision in the case of Saldumbehere vs. Mark Watterson, affirming the decision and order of Judge Virden in the Superior Court of this county. This decision is a very important one to the ranchmen in this county, the action having been brought by a rancher to restrain a sheepman from taking possession of the waters of a small creek three or four miles above his ranch, using them for watering his sheep, and permitting his sheep to not only muddy the remaining waters, but to cause such quantities of sand and debris to be carried down on to the land as to destroy large portions of the crop of growing grass and vegetation. Judge Virden granted an injunction, restraining the sheepman from trespassing upon and using the water, which had been located and used for many years prior by Mr. Watterson and predecessors in irrigating his lands, and the Supreme Court now not only confirms the judgment, but makes the injunction perpetual. This decision should be very pleasing to our ranchmen who are troubled, more or less, every summer as Mr. Watterson has been.—Chronicle Union.

The Outlook.

The Butcher and Stockman's Review has this to say on the beef question:

Notwithstanding any reports circulated to the contrary, we can certainly state with confidence that there will not be any shortage in the meat supply of San Francisco during the midwinter fair. Our wholesale slaughterers have provided months ago for any emergency, and in fact now hold enough stock in the interior to supply more than twice the estimated number of visitors to the city. That there is a shortage in visitors is, however, correct, which circumstance has prevented an extra demand and has stopped, as anticipated, a rise in live stock values. Many cattlemen who are now feeding stock in the hope of obtaining better figures than now, must naturally feel disappointed; but we think, once the fair gets fairly under way after the 27th instant, things will improve. We will see many more strangers, have a much better demand for everything, with correspondingly higher rates all along the line.

A Camp Dinner.

At the end of last week Charley Collins issued a general invitation to visit his ditch camp on Sunday and partake of a Camp dinner. Over sixty people responded. Hay wagons were sent to town to take out all who wished to go, and the affair became a general pic-nic. Charley has a fine camp completed. He has built a portable house with cooking department and bunks. He has a large corral with mangers, feed-boxes and all complete, and quite a stack of hay. There are enough Fresno and dump scrapers at camp to put quite a force of men at work. The dinner was immense. Roast quail and duck, roast beef and Boston baked beans formed the base of supplies, filled in with pies, cakes and various other good things.

Public Notice.

I take this means of notifying S. A. Densmore that his irrigating ditch running through my land is damaging my property by making deep cuts and washes. And you are hereby notified to repair said ditch and put it in condition to prevent further damage. C. A. WALTER.

A very large and bright meteor was seen last night about 10:15 o'clock. Its course was from south to north and was so brilliant that it lighted up the sky like an electric flash light. It is reported by telegraph that the sound of a heavy explosion was heard at Candelaria and Belleville caused by the meteor striking near there. There is no doubt but that it was a very large meteoric body and should cause scientific research.

The co-partnership heretofore existing between J. W. Mahon and J. W. P. Laird in the practice of law has dissolved by mutual consent of the parties. Mr. Mahon will occupy the office used by the firm, and Mr Laird will announce the location of his office in a few days.—Kern County Gazette.

As the fair will be held at Independence this year, work should be commenced on the race track to get it in suitable condition. The entire track should be plowed and leveled immediately so that the spring rains will pack it.

Mrs. J. R. Eldred of Big Pine has lately received a Newcomb fly-shuttle loom, and is prepared to do carpet weaving, also fancy rugs, portieres, shawls etc. Save your rags and get them woven. The machine does excellent work, and prices are very moderate.

As reported last week, Corbett defeated Mitchell in three rounds at Jacksonville, Fla. Mitchell was no match for Corbett, the latter winning with the greatest ease. Jackson and Corbett will meet some time next summer.

Governor Markham has commuted the sentence of Governor Markham to imprisonment for life. That is more mercy than McNulty had for John Collins when he shot him down.

A communication from the General Land Office to the Land Office at Visalia states that no change will be made in the location of the various California Land Offices.

THE U. S. Government Chemists have reported, after an examination of the different brands, that the ROYAL Baking Powder is absolutely pure, greatest in strength, and superior to all others.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER COMPANY, 106 WALL ST. NEW-YORK.

Gave Him Plenty of Room.

Americans haven't much reputation for veneration and in the general scramble are not noted for courtesy to one another, but one day recently, when the mercury suddenly fell off thirty points and the wind was tripping along at the average rate of fifty to sixty miles an hour, and two or three times faster in spots, there was witnessed a scene on crowded Broadway near the postoffice that reversed all of this. An honest, sober, upright workman passed along and the courtesy with which he was treated on all sides spoke volumes for American politeness.

No matter how roughly the icy wind played with the mob, the individual members of the latter bowed right and left to this honest workman. He was bowlegged and dirty too. They might jostle each other, but not him. For he carried a pane of glass about 18 inches wide and 5 feet long. And the wind occasionally caught it and shied it, shining and shifting in the sunshine, to one side and the other, and sent its nervous bearer swing around in the vicious eddies, filling his eyes with dust, as if intent upon first confusing and then breaking him up in business.

The polite crowd parted before him like the billowy sea before a Cunarder then fell together gurgling in his wake to tremble at what might have happened. It is doubtful if a workingman ever before cut so wide a swath on Broadway. It was actually fascinating to watch his progress and to speculate into how many thousand fragments a single misstep might cause the glass to be divided. All the business world stood still for a minute to see him pass. —New York Herald.

Against Fog and Smoke.

Movements are on foot in various quarters having for their object the abatement of the smoke and fog nuisance. The London fogs which descend upon the town are bad enough, but are made almost unbearable to the healthiest and most robust people by smoke. Some extraordinary facts were elicited at the interview granted on Sunday by the lord mayor to a deputation from South Wales which wanted to introduce anthracite coal for house purposes. It was shown that the coal was largely used in Paris, Berlin and other Continental and American cities which enjoy an atmosphere absolutely pure compared with London's. The deputation held that anything tending to abate the fog nuisance should be given a fair trial.

Sir John Puleston, who introduced the deputation, said that there were 700,000 houses in London and 1,500,000 chimneys. On a cold day about 40,000 tons of coal were consumed, emitting 480 tons of sulphur. His argument was that anthracite coal was cleaner and cheaper if householders could only be made to understand it. The mayor thought the deputation made a clear case, not for trade purposes, but for the public welfare, and promised his earnest support. —London Cor. New York Herald.

Slow Advance Toward the North.

The difficulties that make the quest of the pole so arduous have been discovered by slow degrees. It is marvelous how soon nearly the full limits of northward attainment were reached. In 1596 Barents discovered Spitzbergen in about 78 degrees north; in 1770 Hudson reached 80 degrees; in 1827 Parry, by sledging on the ice when his ship became fast, succeeded in touching 82 degrees 45 minutes. Since then all the enormous resources of modern science—steam, electricity, preserved foods and the experience of centuries—have only enabled 40 miles of additional poleward advance to be made. —McClure's Magazine.

My Heart's Delight.

By LOUISE STOCKTON.

Hale was standing at the door. Our visitor had vanished, and I looked in mute appeal to my friend, still feeling that the girl was distracted. But Hale understood. He came directly to her, took her in his strong grasp and made her sit down. He gave her a drink of water and sat down in front of her. "Now," said he, "we will help you, but first you must control yourself and tell us so we can understand. If Jack is to be helped cool heads, not broken hearts, will have to do it. Crawford," and he turned to me, "sit down. You are as much upset as she is. Now what is the matter with Jack? It is Jack Lewis, your nephew, I suppose?"

I silently handed him the paper, and he read it without a word of comment. "And you knew him?" he said to Margaret.

She nodded her head. "And you were engaged to him?"

The color swept up over the face that had been so drawn and white.

"No," she answered, "I was not engaged to him." She looked from one to the other, put her hand to her throat as if she was choking. Then she spoke:

"I will have to tell you! It was my fault, because I should have come away sooner. I met him in the Adirondacks last summer and we were in the same party because I was visiting the wife of an old college friend of his, and I thought there was no harm in it—in seeing him so often, I mean—because every one knew that I was engaged to my cousin. But the night before I left there he begged me to break the engagement, and he told me what was true, that I didn't love my cousin. But I did not know then that I could not marry Ned Mason. You see I had been engaged to him ever since I was 18, and I refused to even think of breaking it. Jack said some hard, hard things to me and I was angry with him. After I came home I found I could easier die than marry Ned. And my uncle was so violently disappointed that I had to leave the house. Then I came here."

The shadow of a smile passed over Hale's face, but I took her hand in mine.

"And you did rightly," I said. "I was the one to whom you should have come."

"But I came because I had so often watched you in church and thought there never was so kind a face, and I had heard how good you were to the girls you had here, and of course I had to earn some money; I would not take any from my uncle."

"Still you knew I was Jack's uncle?"

"Yes," she said gently.

The very incoherence and simplicity of her little story touched me greatly, and I looked at Hale expecting to read in his eyes pity, sympathy. Instead I saw judgment and disapprobation. I knew he condemned her as a coquette who had not known her own mind. This I greatly resented, and I felt he was narrow and prejudiced. And because he was hard in his thoughts of her I became more tender, and I should have liked to have comforted her as I should my own daughter. But I said to her that I believed in her and I should help her, "but I cannot see," I said, "why now that you are free Jack should keep up his resentment. Had i been your lover at his age I should have flown to you."

Her eyes flashed at this.

"Do you suppose I would send him word that I was free?"

"Surely you could in some way let him know."

"No girl would do such a thing as that," she promptly answered, and then her lips trembled, her eyes filled and she broke into a bitter weeping. We could not stand this, old fellows as we were, and Hale jumped up and walked around the room, and cleared his throat, and blew his nose, and ejaculated all sorts of exclamations, while in broken words, in ways foreign to me for many years, I tried to soothe and quiet her. But when she ceased her sobbing it was only to break into a wailing still more pitiful, until at last she lay exhausted, her head against my shoulder. Hale brought coats and whatever he could find, and he made her a bed on chairs and persuaded her to drink wine. Then we laid her down and we left her and went into our own room. We closed the door and looked at each other.

"This is a pretty piece of work," said Hale.

"It is pitiful—it is terrible!" I groaned "He was a good fellow. I could have loved him."

"I remember him well," replied Hale; "a handsome, impetuous fellow, much too fine to be made the sport of a girl's caprice."

"There was no caprice there," and I looked up, irritated by his persistent misunderstanding; "she has acted as became a conscientious girl."

"Well, well," rejoined Hale, "we will not discuss that question, but now—how now?"

"I shall go at once to Tiger Hill—spot itly named! Whether Jack is dead or alive I must see after him, Hale—he had neither father nor mother."

"Now look here," said he; "haven't you again and again written to him that you desired to make his future your care? Didn't you bring him east and set him to work in this very office? Didn't you give him to understand you were prepared to treat him as a son? You know all this is true! And you know Jack declared his work stupid, the paper poky. You know he was determined to be the maker of his own destiny. Grieve as much as you choose, Dan, but don't fall into womanish reproach of yourself. Jack was a fine fellow, but he was pig headed, and I truly believe that when he fell in love with Miss Woolstine it was partly because she was out of his reach. He is just the boy to want the moon and refuse the green cheese."

"You were jealous of Jack," said I feebly.

"That is stuff! I was not blind."

"And you are at this moment jealous of the girl," I added.

What reply Hale would have made to this accusation I know not, for at that moment the door opened and Margaret came in. Her face was still pale and her eyes swollen, but she was perfectly calm, and I noticed that her hands did not tremble as she held them together, her fingers lightly clutched.

"You are going at once?" she said.

I got up and hunted the time tables, and found my best train left the city at 10:30 p. m., bringing me to Tiger Hill the evening of the next day. This gave me time to go to Melvin and get what I needed for the trip.

"Well, then," said the girl, "I will be at the station at 10. I can meet you there."

"But—but that is impossible!" I exclaimed. "I cannot take you. It would not do at all—not at all! I will telegraph, write—you should hear at once and fully, but it is impossible to allow you to go."

Never in all my life did I meet a look so determined, so full of scorn for restraint as the one Margaret shot at me! She said not a word, but going into her office returned with her hat on, her veil tightly drawn and so silently left the office.

Hale shrugged his shoulders.

"There was a pair of them," he said. "I do not wonder they had tumultuous scenes."

"She won't go—you do not think she will go?"

"Not if you wreck all the trains. But even then she might walk. Yes, Crawford, she will go."

"But she shall not! What could I do with her? Suppose she falls to weeping, to fainting in the train? And after we get there! Why, Hale, I am not sure of my own safety; and with her to hamper me— It is impossible! She must be locked up—tied—not allowed to do it."

"She won't faint nor weep," said Hale, "still she will be a dreadful burden for you. I'll go see her, but I have no hope of influencing her."

"Go to her uncle," said I; "surely he has some authority over her."

"I'll do my best," said he, "but I won't promise you success."

I went to Melvin, packed up my handbag, made arrangements with my housekeeper, and all the time my thoughts dwelt on Margaret in fear and dismay. My only hope was that her violent agitation might make her ill, and so prostrate her that she would be unable to force herself to take the journey.

When I reached the station a few minutes after 10 I found Hale standing at the entrance.

"Well?" said I.

He pointed with his thumb over his shoulder. "She is in the waiting room," he said, and taking my bag he added: "She carries less baggage than you do."

"Did you see her?" said I. "Couldn't you convince her? Surely you could have done that."

"Could I put the rings of Saturn around Jupiter? My dear boy, I did not try to convince her. She would not discuss the question. She asked me about the mines and the strike, but she knows far more about it all than we do. She has used the exchanges to advantage. She even knows the names of the leaders among the strikers. There is no end to her nerve, I think. She won't break down again."

"She'll break down as soon as the excitement of starting is over. Surely you, a married man, know that a woman's calmness may be as hysterical as her tears. Good heavens—" and I stood still, "I will not go until 7:15 to-morrow morning! I will not lose much time. I cannot do anything the night I get there."

"Then she'll go alone. She has her ticket, and when her train is called she will be off. She won't wait for you."

"How do you know she has her ticket?"

"I bought it for her. I went to her boarding house and brought her here, then I bought her ticket."

"Judas!" said I. "And I do not believe you saw her uncle."

"There was no use in seeing any one. Apollyon would not have stopped her. All I could do was to take a little care of her."

"I believe in my heart you encouraged her," I testily cried.

"Don't be unreasonable, Dan," said he. "Don't quarrel to-night, my boy. It is as much as I can stand to see you go off, and I declare I will go with you! Of course I will. I can look after Margaret and leave you free."

"And who will get this week's number out? No, no, Hale"—and I fell into line at the ticket office—"it wouldn't be wise. I'd do better by myself, and three of us would be ruin to everything. And I never did quarrel with you. Begin to-night? Not much, Reuben."

And so getting my ticket I went into the waiting room and found Margaret composed, alert and confident.

Hale pressed through the gate, carrying our bags, and when the train ran out of the station I glanced back out of the window and saw him trying to look cheery and hopeful, but a more miserable, woebegone face never did I see. He waved his hat as much as to say, "I knew you'd do it!" and turned away.

CHAPTER III.

She sprang to her feet and she sang.

There was still a dim light in the sky, but the lamps were lighted in the car. People were preparing for the night's journey. Men were reading the evening papers as though every moment was a consideration, and in a seat opposite a woman was trying to soothe a baby, while another little one clung to her, begging to be taken into her lap.

"A pleasant lookout for the night," I said to Margaret, in a voice much too flat and empty of emotion to be natural.

"They are almost dead with sleep now," said she, and in a moment what did she do but cross over and take the baby and toss it in her young, strong arms. The baby felt the change from the lax, nervous grasp of its mother,

A War Time Relic.

A relic of the war between the states is now on the dry dock, receiving such minor repairs and cleaning as may be necessary to commission her for harbor defense. This was the second monitor ever built, and the record of her usefulness and her hard service may be seen in the shot dents of the turrets. These are painted in a color different from that of the surrounding iron in order to emphasize their story, and they serve as an object lesson to show that after all, when compared with our days, how innocuous were the boasted shot and shell of the rebellion. Of course it does not make much difference whether a giant is killed by a toothpick or hoisted with a petard. He is dead all the same, and worms will eat him. But we were proud, and with good reason, of those big smooth bores and of their charges in those parlous days.

Then the theory was that for every ten pounds of shot one pound of powder was needed, a 90-pounder being fired with nine pounds of powder; today we have for each pound of powder two pounds of shot, the 10-inch guns of the Miantonomoh, the Nantucket's neighbor, using 250 pounds of powder to drive the 500-pound projectile. The Nantucket has also a sentimental interest, for when the great Ericsson lay in state on her decks in the harbor of New York, she was the immediate representative of what his genius had evoked to save the country in time of peril, for the original Monitor went down one dismal day off our treacherous coast, and left as the second product of her wonderful type the little coast defender which now lies half hidden within the walls of the dry dock.—Harper's Weekly.

Tremendous Pressure.

The pressure that can be produced by electrolytic generation of gas in a closed space has been tested by a French scientist. The highest pressure heretofore realized was 6,570 pounds to the square inch. In this instance the pressure obtained was between 12,000 and 18,000 to the square inch, when the manometer cracked without any explosion. The liquid used was a 25 per cent. solution of soda. The electrodes were of iron, and the current 1¼ amperes.—New York Times.

An Australian agricultural paper makes note of an immense increase in the number of sheep in Australia in the last two or three years, and of the enormous development of the grazing capabilities of the country. The estimated number of sheep in Australia in 1892 is 60,000,000, against 31,000,000 in 1884.

The number of monarchies in Europe has increased by one during the past year, the duchy of Luxembourg having become a sovereign state by the death of the queen of Holland.

ON THE OCEAN.

There is no place where ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS do not prove their value. George Augustus Sala, the well-known English writer, writing of his trip across the Pacific, says:

"I especially have a pleasant remembrance of the ship's doctor—a very experienced maritime medico indeed, who tended me most kindly during a horrible spell of bronchitis a spasmodic asthma, provoked by the sea fog which had swooped down on us just after we left San Francisco. But the doctor's prescriptions and the increasing warmth of the temperature as we neared the tropics, and, in particular, a couple of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS clapped on—one on the chest and another between the shoulder blades—soon set me right."

A HERALD OF THE INFANT YEAR.

Clip the last thirty years or more from the century, and the segment will represent the term of the unbounded popularity of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The opening of the year 1894 will be signalized by the appearance of a fresh Almanac of the Bitters, in which the uses, derivation and action of this world-famous medicine will be lucidly set forth. Everybody should read it. The calendar and astronomical calculations to be found in this brochure are always astonishingly accurate, and the statistics, illustrations, humor and other reading matter rich in interest and full of profit. The Hostetter Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., publish it themselves. They employ more than sixty hands in the mechanical work, and more than eleven months in the year are consumed in its preparation. It can be obtained, without cost, of all druggists and country dealers, and is printed in English, German, French, Welsh, Norwegian, Swedish, Holland, Bohemian and Spanish.

Two Things about Catarrh in the Head

First—It is a constitutional disease. Prof. Gross, a leading scientist, says: "Catarrh is a constitutional disease which manifests itself by local symptoms." Dr. Dio Lewis says: "Catarrh is not a disease of the man's nose; it is a disease of the man." Therefore he says snuffs and other local applications are useless.

Second—It requires a constitutional remedy, like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which reaches and cures Catarrh by purifying the blood and building up the system, so as to throw off the disease. Thousands who formerly suffered from Catarrh agree that

IRELAND'S SAINT.

The Unembellished Story of St. Patrick's Eventful Career.

SOME OF HIS STRANGE ADVENTURES

Few Historical Personages are Shrouded in as Much Myth and Interesting Legendary Lore.

"St. Patrick," one Irishman was heard to say to another the other day, "was the greatest man that ever lived."

"He was," the other replied, "the greatest man that ever lived or died either."

Certain it is that in this time and country the festival of no other saint is so honored as that of St. Patrick on the 17th of March. Nor could any saint be chosen whose life popular tradition has surrounded with a more picturesque variety of incidents. The people whose patron he is are one of the most absorbingly and romantically interesting nations of the world. They have never been, for reasons that are well understood, a rich or a cultivated people. They are rough and simple in their character, but they have warm hearts, tender, poetic and often grotesque imaginations, and a rich, peculiar and inexhaustible humor.

All these qualities are strangely mixed in their national traditions and especially in the stories of St. Patrick. Sometimes the result seems to have a savor of irreverence, but it may be surely trusted that there is no such intention and that no saint receives more genuine veneration from his people than does the patron saint of Ireland.

The unembellished history of St. Patrick is not long. The information about his life is meager and confused. Wales, Scotland and France all claim his birth, with the weight of probability in favor of Wales. The date was about 373. When he was about sixteen years old he was stolen by pirates or marauders from the north and sold as a slave in Ireland.

For seven years he tended swine on a mountain in County Antrim, and then he escaped to the Continent, where he became deacon, priest and bishop. He came of good family and the ecclesiastical name of Patricius was given him by Pope Celestine, who sent him back to Ireland to convert the people. The accounts differ about his age at this time. Some of the dates given indicate that he was about thirty, others that he was nearer sixty. Before he returned to Ireland he had visions. Among them was one of a man named Victoricus, who brought him letters. In one of these were the words, "The voice of the Irish," and as he read them he heard a voice say, "We pray thee, holy youth, to come and henceforward walk amongst us."

After this he spent his life in preaching, baptizing and working miracles and accomplished the practical conversion of the people of the island. He died at the age of about 120 and was buried at Downpatrick. Even in this plain account it may be seen that there is something which approaches the border line between history and legend. But when pure legend is considered there is no end to the variety and ingenuity of the tales that are told. Some of them are so generally known and trusted that they amount to history in the eyes of the people of the country, while there are others which it is hardly possible to suppose were ever believed by anybody.

When St. Patrick first began to talk to the Irish of the Trinity they did not believe him, till he picked a shamrock and illustrated the doctrine by the three leaves growing on one stem, and then they were converted and the shamrock became sacred to St. Patrick. It is said by others that the shamrock worn on St. Patrick's Day represents the cross. But the shamrock was held sacred by the Druids in Ireland before St. Patrick's time, as was also the mistletoe, whose leaves, as well as berries, were likewise arranged in threes, three being a sacred number.

St. Patrick's followers once suffered from cold, when he commanded them to gather ice and snow. When they had made a large pile he breathed upon it and it became a bright fire. Two of these stories are also told in a different form. When the saint was a child he gathered some bits of ice, and his nurse told him that he would be better employed in gathering firewood, whereupon he breathed on the ice and it took fire. When he was sold as a slave it is said that the price was a kettle, but it was at once found that the hotter the fire was made under the kettle the colder the kettle became, till it was returned in disgust, and St. Patrick was restored to his former master, when the kettle again boiled properly.

Of course the saint's most famous achievement was ridding Ireland of snakes. It has been related that he called the serpents together to the top of a mountain and compelled them to swallow one another till there was none left, but this seems improbable. A more authentic account is that he drove them out by beating a drum, and that in his enthusiasm he knocked a hole in it, which an angel at once came and mended. One hugh snake he chained in Lough Dilveen, telling it to stay till Monday, and even to this day, every Monday morning, the snake calls out in good Irish, "It's a long Monday, Patrick!"

It is interesting to note here that Pliny says that serpents are never seen on trefoil, and that the leaf prevails against the bites of snakes and scorpions. Not only did St. Patrick drive out the snakes, but, as everybody knows, he made the soil itself inimical to serpent life, and even the wood that grows on it has a similar property, for it is said that King's college, at Cambridge, is built of Irish wood and that spiders are never seen in it.—New York Tribune.

Experience of a Brother and Sister.

An acquaintance in Chicago was lying ill from nervous prostration. While the family was at dinner she looked out on a glorious sunset, and suddenly felt an overwhelming desire to see a young brother camping out—his first summer at West Point. Then she distinctly heard him call her name three times. She was seized with fear, and when her family came to her she related the incident and felt confident that the boy was ill, perhaps dying.

Thirty-six hours afterward she received a letter from her brother saying: "A strange thing has happened to me. I was doing guard duty yesterday evening when suddenly I saw you distinctly in a long white robe. I called your name three times, and so loud that the man at the next post heard me. It makes me very anxious about you."—New York Evening Sun.

A wise woman never treats a man so well as when she has reason to believe he is beginning to think something of some other woman.

If a man never had any fault found with him by his employer, it must be because he never had brains enough to get a job.

A Clever Dog.

Patrick Jordan, a teamster, living at Twenty-third street and Fairmount avenue, has had for several years a handsome and most intelligent Scotch terrier which he calls Bob, and who has so endeared himself to the teamster and his family by his good nature, affection and development of rare sagacity that his comfort and tastes are almost as much a matter of family concern and consideration as those of any one in the household.

One of the most striking evidences of the dog's great intelligence was given one evening. Bob, for some trifling breach of kitchen etiquette, was relegated to the back yard for a brief spell. It was rather cold outside, and Bob obeyed the mandate of the head of the house with great reluctance, not to say insubordination.

In a few minutes afterward, just as the irate feelings of Mr. Jordan had begun to relax, partly owing to his own feeling for Bob and also to the importunities of his children, who were much affected by Bob's disgrace and were imploring their father for his pardon and reinstatement on the family hearth, several soft knocks came to the door, and on it being opened Bob sedately walked in, and proceeding to the other end of the room jumped on a chair, from which, standing up on his two legs, he could reach a box containing matches. This he did, and gravely abstracting several in his mouth he jumped down again and walked over to the door, apparently intending to go out and to attempt to start a fire in the yard to keep himself warm.

He had often procured matches for his master in the same way and had seen the operation of lighting them, and it is supposed that this extraordinary act of canine sagacity had followed from these facts.

Bob's singular behavior in this instance broke down at once at any trace of resentment or anger which his former fall from grace had caused, and amid shouts of laughter he was restored at once to his master's favor.—Philadelphia Times.

Perfumes Among the Romans.

The amount of perfume used in the palmy days of Rome was enormous; the wealthy patricians were most prodigal in this respect. The perfumers were called Unguentarii, as they principally compounded unguents, and must have done an immense business. In Rome they congregated in a quarter called the "Vicus Thuraricus." The most celebrated perfumer in the time of Martial was a certain individual named Cosmus, whom Martial frequently mentions. At Capua there was such a number of perfumers that the principal street of the city, named Seplasia, was almost entirely occupied by them. For the most part these tradesmen were Greeks, and, as at Athens, their shops (taberna) were the rendezvous of the rich idlers of those days.

The perfumed oils and ointments were made in great variety. The basis of the oils was generally the oil of Ben, and that of the unguents was a bleached and partly purified tallow. They were used not only for the hair, but to anoint all parts of the body, especially after the bath, which was quite a complicated process. It was also customary at banquets to honor the guests by pouring costly perfumed oils over their feet. Some of these were simple oils, such as rhodium, made from roses; melinum, made from quinces; metopium, from bitter almonds; narcissimum, from the narcissus.

Perhaps the most fashionable oil after the oleum susinum was that called crocinum, made from saffron (crocus), which communicated both a fine color and odor to the person. Heliogabalus never bathed without it.—Knowledge.

Velocity of Light.

We are familiar with the rush of the express train as it flashes past us at the rate of sixty miles an hour, but light actually travels 11,179,560 times as fast! The initial velocity of the shot from the 12-pound bronze service gun is only 1,769 feet a second, or 1-556,134 only that of light, and yet so stupendous is the scale on which the visible universe is framed that this vehicle of our sole knowledge of our neighbors in space, which would travel around the earth in 0.1,336 of a second of time, does not reach us from Neptune under a period of more than four hours, while from the nearest fixed star (Alpha Centauri) it occupies 3¾ years, and from a little star called Mu in Cassiopeia its journey occupies 90.7 years.

These be it noted, are stars whose "parallax" has been measured and whose distance is known. In the case of the more distant ones thousands of years may elapse ere their light message reaches us, and did our optical means enable us to see what is going on on their surface we should gaze upon the events of their ancient history and be eyewitnesses of what happened thousands of years ago.—Leisure Hours.

The Humorist in Congress.

"Once a man establishes a reputation as a wit or a humorist it clings to him for life," said Representative Charles E. Hooker. "Whenever he gets up to speak people expect to hear something funny. Proctor Knott, you remember, had such a reputation, mainly on account of his famous Duluth speech. I remember on one occasion he began a speech in the house in his usual humorous vein. In a moment every member on the floor crowded around him. After he had spoken about five minutes, he said: 'But now, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this bill seriously'—members did not allow him to finish the sentence, but broke for the cloakrooms. They did not want to hear him talk seriously. My friend John Allen is a humorist also, but he uses his humor to good advantage. He makes it tell in its effect on the opposition. It has often been said, you know, that Sunset Cox handicapped his political aspirations with his humor."—Washington Post.

A Way of Sharpening Files.

An electro-chemical method of sharpening files has been published by an industrial association of Paris. It is the idea of M. Personne and consists in cleaning the files from grease, then suspending them for twenty minutes from a metal plate in a mixture of 100 parts water, six parts nitric acid and three parts sulphuric acid. The plate is connected with several carbons in the same liquid. The corrosion of the metal takes place in the cavities only, the edges being sharpened exactly as by a file cutter. The process is said to be satisfactory and economical, and it may be applied to the sharpening of chisels and other tools.—Philadelphia Ledger.

ALL IN ONE DREAM

Wonderful Work Accomplished by a Man in a Short Space of Time.

THE REPORTER'S ARDUOUS DETAIL.

Remarkable Swiftness With Which the Mind Works When it is Supposed to be Taking a Rest.

A few evenings since a number of newspaper men were in an office awaiting the arrival of a gentleman who was to call together a meeting that they had been directed to report for their respective papers.

A number of topics was discussed, and one of these was dreams and the extreme rapidity with which mental operations are performed. A number of experiences were given, but the one that attracted the most attention was that of a Call representative, who narrated what he had done in a dream.

"It was," said he, "in 1868 that after a hard day's work I reached home and lost no time in retiring. Glancing at the clock as I turned off the gas I noticed that it was just 16 minutes after midnight.

"Shall I tell you at this point how long I was dreaming or tell first what I did in my dream? That you all may better appreciate what was done, I will defer the matter until the end. Bear in mind that what is to be told was all in the dream. Seated in the old office on Commercial street, above Montgomery, I was endeavoring to put into presentable shape the facts of a trial that had taken place in the district court, when in came E. A. Rockwell, who was the chief editorial writer, and calling me by name said: 'You had better get ready and go to San Leandro. There's been a terrible railroad accident. There's 50 or 60 people killed, and I don't know how many injured.' George E. Barnes, at that time one of the proprietors and managing editors, had overheard Rockwell, and in that quiet way of his suggested that no time be lost in reaching Oakland, and there procuring a buggy and a pair of horses, to go to San Leandro or wherever the accident was.

"Rushing down to the ferry landing at the corner of Pacific and Davis streets, I reached there in time to find that the steamer for the other side of the bay had just pulled out, and that I would have to wait half an hour for the next boat. The delay was vexatious, and then when the ferryboat did move eastward it seemed as if she would never make her landing, she seemed to be going so slowly. When the slip on the other side was reached, there was some accident to the local train, and there was not any prospect of starting for an hour or more. There was not a team of any kind at the landing, so I had to walk to Oakland.

"A desire to make up for the time lost urged me on, and I think the time made from the landing to Broadway and Washington street has never been beaten by man. Near the corner I went into a livery stable and ordered a pair of horses hitched up. There was a delay there, for the proprietor had his doubts about the ability of the team making the trip out and back. Finally I started, and the way those horses flew over the road was a caution. When the scene of the disaster, some distance beyond San Leandro, about 14 miles from Oakland, was reached, I proceeded at once to gather the facts.

"Down on the notebook were penciled the names of 30 odd men, women and children who had either been killed outright or burned to death in some of the cars which had caught fire. Then followed the names of about 40 who had been injured, a description of their injuries and the opinions of the physicians who were in attendance as to the possible outcome in each case. Now, any of you who have had experience in gathering information of that kind can fully appreciate that it was not child's play, for the injured were in different places, and it required time to get around to them all.

"Then there was the obtaining of data about the dead. A number of them were well known residents of this city, others were from San Jose, so it became necessary to obtain enough to give each a decent obituary notice. In addition to this it became a part of my duty to get the statements of passengers, so as to describe their feelings when the train derailed and went over on its side down a little gully and be able to write up the narrow or fortunate escape of each. Then there were railroad officials to interview, and, as you all know, they are the hardest kind of people to obtain facts from.

"Well, it took nearly three hours to get all the matter that was needed for a sensational article that was to appear under a half column scare head. Then there was the ride back to Oakland settlement with the livery stable man, who swore that he would never rent a team to a newspaper man again, a rush in a hack to the ferry landing and the trip to this city. Without waiting to get anything to eat I made my way to the office and at once commenced to write up, telling every one who came to ask for details to let me alone. I did not write in upper plate style, and for that matter I never did, but I wrote and kept on writing until I had enough to fill what would make about four full columns of The Call of the present day and wrote that big scare head. As I handed the last line to the foreman to set up I heaved a sigh of relief and exclaimed, 'Thank goodness, that's done!' That is my dream.

"At that moment I felt a hand on my shoulder, jumped from the bed and heard my wife ask, 'What are you dreaming about?' I lit the gas, looked at the clock and discovered that it was 17¼ minutes after midnight, or, in other words, that in my dream of less than two minutes I had performed all that I have related.

Very few can reach deep into their own minds without meeting what they wish to hide from themselves.

Character of the German Emperor.

The new emperor, on mounting the throne, was of course expected to sustain the policy of a minister whom his grandfather had honored with every mark that a loyal subject or even a money loving one could ask. The reign of Frederick III, less than a hundred days, had been too short and too full of physical suffering to let the world know the strength and breadth of the ruler whom Bismarck next appeared to represent. In his successor the Germans have an emperor who has not only abundant physical energy and endurance, but has with it a contempt for humbug, socialism and the crooked police methods that always suggest a feeble or rotten executive. He is a practical manager and does not pretend to be a savior of society. He has no quack nostrum for poverty, crime, prostitution or the discontent that sets class against class.

His business is to see that the government machine runs smoothly, that competent men are employed, that the people's taxes are spent for the public good, that the law is administered without favor and that reforms are inquired into. He has the mind of a Yankee, he loves experiment, his methods are direct. He is the sort of man that forges to the front in a new country. We can imagine him learning his trade in some machine shop, then rapidly rising to a position where inventive talent, thoroughness, patience and, above all, honesty tell—say, at the head of some great manufacturing or shipbuilding enterprise.

On his succession to power, 1888, he did what most intelligent young men do when suddenly placed in charge of an estate. He inquired how the previous manager had done his work; he examined personally into cases of alleged wrong; he noted carefully the testimony of qualified observers; his eyes were opened to the need of reform in many directions; he suggested these reforms to his manager; the manager did not agree with the master; the manager resigned and now spends his time in embarrassing as far as he can the movements of the manager who has superseded him. The immediate cause of Bismarck's resignation will be known when the emperor chooses to make the matter public. Today we can regard only the official acts of the minister, and from these infer what reason there was for his being retired.—Poultney Bigelow in Forum.

Modern Cloud Compellers.

A curious and interesting experiment was tried early one morning at the Jardine d'Acclimitation. Some ingenious person has hit upon a scheme for making artificial clouds for the warming of fields and preventing damage to crops. A number of stoves had been placed ten yards apart around the spot selected, and when they were lighted a thick black smoke was produced. Unfortunately for the success of the experiment, there was too much wind, and the "clouds" were dispersed immediately, the smoke being blown toward the inclosure occupied by the seals, who did not seem at all to appreciate it.

It is said that some experiments carried on in the Gironde were far more successful, and that the system will be largely used there to protect the vines. It is said that a vineyard could be made two or three degrees warmer. Several officers attended the experiments yesterday to see whether the process could be utilized for military purposes.—Galignani Messenger.

He Knew All About It.

The British legation building in Washington is draped in mourning for the late Duke of Clarence, but everybody doesn't seem to know it. Last week when a visiting delegation was there, two delegates, whether they were from Chicago or not it is not necessary to state, were showing each other the town. As they passed along Connecticut avenue one of them said:

"That big brick over there with the portico-chere in front of it is the English legation."

"Is that so," said the other, taking it in carefully as tourists do. "It's got mourning on it, I see."

"Yes," explained the first one with an air of superior knowledge, "that's for Justice Bradley, who died recently."—Detroit Free Press.

Growing a New Hoof.

A singular condition has developed in the buffalo herd at the Philadelphia Zoo. Late in last year the hoof and mouth disease affected the cattle of Europe very seriously, and there were slight visitations of it in this country. One of these was at the Philadelphia Zoo among the buffalo. Eight of the herd were isolated. Since then the symptoms of this disease have disappeared from all but one of those isolated. This one, however, has lost a hoof, and is now hard at work raising a new one, hobbling around on three legs. This is the only case on record in America of a buffalo losing a hoof and growing a new one in captivity.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Scared Tourists.

The recent earthquake gave a good many eastern tourists at Los Angeles "a bad half hour." One guest at a leading hotel rushed panic stricken into the barroom, clad in a night shirt, over which he had buttoned his vest, a pair of boots, and carrying an umbrella under his arm. He would have rushed out into the street but for the clerk.—San Francisco Call.

A Group of Wealthy Men.

A group of men who meet almost daily at lunch in the cafe of the Chicago club includes Marshall Field, Potter Palmer and L. Z. Leiter, who began life as clerks in dry goods stores, and are now worth from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 apiece.—Chicago Letter.

Spring in Walla Walla.

In the Walla Walla valley, Wash., spring is as far advanced as in western Oregon. Crocuses and hyacinths are in bloom, lilacs are in bud and cherry and peach trees will soon be in full blossom. The winter was a mild and short one in that favored locality.

LAUGHING GAS.

It was Discovered by Accident and Used to Amuse the Public.

ITS EFFECT ON MIND AND BODY.

How Dr. Wells, of Hartford, Conn., Learned the Value of the Anæsthetic for Dental Operations.

Nitrous oxide or laughing gas was first discovered by an English chemist named Priestley, in 1776. Primarily it was used in exhibitions for the purpose of producing the peculiar exhilarating effect which it has upon some natures when inhaled in small quantities, and which is the reason for its being known the world over as laughing gas. Sir Humphrey Davy suggested a century ago that it might be used in surgical operations where there was no great effusion of blood, but until 1844 little, if any, further attention was paid to it.

On the 10th of December, 1844, there was given at Hartford, an exhibition of the effects of laughing gas. This exhibition was merely for the sake of making money, and its promoters had not the remotest intention of enlightening the public on the scientific possibilities of nitrous oxide. Curiosity led Dr. Horace Wells, a dentist residing in the city, to go and see the fun. After the exhibition Dr. Wells and some of his friends inhaled the gas themselves. One gentleman named Cooly, on being brought under its influence, became unusually excited and performed a number of involuntary evolutions and gyrations which brought him in contact with the benches and floor in such a manner as to bruise and otherwise injure him. Dr. Wells inquired if he suffered pain from his wounds. Cooly appeared surprised and was not aware that he had been hurt until he saw the blood trickling down his legs.

It was at that moment the idea occurred to Dr. Wells that a man could, by inhaling a sufficient quantity of nitrous oxide gas, be rendered sufficiently unconscious to have a tooth extracted without feeling any pain whatever. Putting his theory into practice, the next day he himself inhaled sufficient gas to render him unconscious, and permitted a brother dentist, Dr. Riggs (since deceased), to extract a great molar. On recovering consciousness Wells exclaimed, "A new era in tooth pulling; it did not hurt as much as the prick of a pin."

This was the first operation ever performed under the influence of nitrous oxide or any other anæsthetic. Previous to this time no person had ever yet inhaled a sufficient quantity to produce insensibility. Having now established the fact that the gas could be safely used and teeth extracted for people under its influence, Drs. Wells and Riggs commenced using it in Hartford and extracted thousands of teeth without the slightest accident ever occurring. In 1847 Dr. Wells unfortunately directed his attention to the study of chloroform and ether, believing that they were better adapted for the purpose than nitrous oxide. In the following year he fell ill from the effects of experimenting upon himself and died a martyr to science on the 24th of January, 1848, at thirty-three years of age, when the medical world was about to pay him the honors his labors merited.

After his death the gas was not generally used for some years, but was finally taken up by dentists and physicians all over the country and by others who, through ignorance or recklessness, were and are abusing it. Statistics show that there has never yet been a single death caused by the inhalation of pure nitrous oxide.

It would not be surprising if the original discovery of the peculiar properties of nitrous oxide were purely accidental. We can be absolutely certain, however, that its application to the painless extraction of teeth was the result of accident. In proof of this Dr. John M. Riggs wrote to Dr. Hasbrouck in 1872 an account of the exhibition which he, accompanied by Dr. Horace Wells, witnessed when the idea first occurred to the latter gentleman that laughing gas might be successfully used as an anæsthetic.

"At that exhibition," says Dr. Riggs, "Dr. Horace Wells was present, and then and there conceived the idea, from an accident, that the gas could be used to extract teeth without pain." Then, after describing how Wells determined to have a tooth extracted under its influence, he went on to say he "invited the party—Colton, Cooly and two others—to come up and witness the operation. I was attending to a patient, but was awaiting Wells' return. When I entered Wells' office the said party was there. Wells took his seat in the operating chair. I examined the tooth so as to be ready to operate without delay. Wells took the bag in his lap, held the tube to his mouth and inhaled until insensibility relaxed the muscles of his arms, his hands fell on his breast, his head dropped on the head rest, and I instantly passed the forceps into the mouth on to the tooth and extracted it. Mr. Colton, Cooly and the two others stood by the open door, ready to run out if Wells jumped up from the chair and made any hostile demonstrations. You may ask, Why did he not get up? Briefly, because he could not.

"Our agreement the night previous was to push the administration to a point hitherto unknown. We knew not whether death or success confronted us. It was a terra incognito we were bound to explore. The result is known to the world. No one but Wells and myself knew to what point the inhalation was to be carried. The result was painfully problematical to us, but the great law of nature hitherto unknown was kind to us and a grand discovery was born into the world. Now, do not understand me as claiming joint discovery with Dr. Wells. The great idea of inspiration was his; that we elaborated it together was honor enough for me. I have no feeling in this matter except in the interest of truth, right and justice.

"For the credit of Dr. Colton I can say he made the gas, gave a bag of it to Dr. Wells to experiment with, witnessed the operation of extracting the first tooth and went on his way to other cities with his 'grand exhibitions' and 'eight strong men to make them laugh more than they have for the six months previous.'"—New York Press.

A new invention is a rubber doorstop and holdback to prevent the slamming of doors and the marring of walls. A rosette containing a rubber ring is screwed into the door, while a knob surmounted with an acorn shaped ball of rubber is fastened to the baseboard. When the door is thrown back the knob engages in the ring, holding the door firmly.—New York Journal.

Mice take excellent care of their aged blind or otherwise helpless kin, concealing them in safe places and providing them with food. It must be remembered, however, that the mouse has lived in a semi domestic state as the companion of men from time immemorial.—Atlantic Monthly.

Everything Was Lovely.

The first girl was telling her friend all about the funeral. She put her handkerchief to her eyes occasionally as she spoke, and it was plain that she was deeply affected.

"Poor Julia is dead," she said slowly, "and today I went to her funeral. Oh, it was the loveliest funeral I ever saw. There were nineteen lovely hacks and a lovely hearse, all trimmed with lovely plumes that nodded in the sad winds just lovely."

She wiped away a falling tear and went on: "I went in the house with a great many misgivings. I was afraid I should be overcome, for Julia was one of the best friends I ever had. She had such a lovely character. Well, the house was thronged. Everything was just lovely. Poor Julia was laid out in a lovely coffin, all covered with lovely roses, and there was besides the loveliest collection of crosses and crowns on the floor. The preacher preached a lovely sermon, telling all about what a lovely character the girl had, of her lovely temper, and of the lovely angels who would lovingly welcome her through the golden gates. Excuse me while I dry these flowing tears."

She dried.

"But it was when I came to look at the dear face of the dead girl that I was most overcome. Her hair was smoothed down in a lovely bang, just as I used to know her in life. Her complexion was lovely and white, for, you know, she suffered dreadfully, and was bleached to the loveliest white tint I ever saw. And I could not help thinking, as I gazed upon my dead friend's dead face, if she could only get up and look in the glass and note her lovely complexion in death, the terrors of the dark journey might well be lightened for her. A lovely bunch of roses held in her hand made her look true to life."

Here the rising flow of grief came back again. The dog on the mat arose, walked around the room three times and then laid down and died. But no one seemed to notice it.—New York Recorder.

How Chinese Pull Teeth.

"We have a powder which rids us of our bad teeth in China," said See Mow Lin. "The doctor comes, and this is what he does: He gets a little powder on his finger and rubs it on the tooth. Then he does this." By way of illustration Mow Lin slapped his right shoulder with his left hand. Then he opened his mouth and said as near as the sound can be reproduced—ch-sch. "Then out comes the tooth. There is very little blood."

"Do you deal in the powder?"

Mow Lin shook his head and smiled a Chinese smile. "We do not bring it here," he said in his rather imperfect English. "No use in bringing it here. The voyage over the ocean destroys the good of the powder."

"Is anything used with the powder?"

"Yes, sometimes. Now, here is a little front tooth. Well, the powder is all that is necessary for that. But suppose it be a tooth here." Lee Mow Lin placed his finger at the farther corner of the lower left jaw. "You see," he went on, "some teeth are like four legged tables, and others are like two legged ones. When it is a four legged one the doctor puts a piece of plaster on the temple, applies the powder, hits the man on the shoulder, and out comes the tooth. There is very little blood. It is much easier than drawing teeth in this country, and the price is only about five cents or a dime."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Picking the Teeth at Table.

The practice of serving toothpicks as a course is no longer observed in polite society. Neither are they used as a sideboard decoration and a centerpiece for the table. Neither are they served along with after dinner coffee, and it is not polite to pick the teeth at table; it is rather the act of a scavenger, even if the face and mouth are covered by a napkin, as some people seem to think is correct. Really refined people suffer pain rather than to pick their teeth at the table. A person might as well brush the teeth at the meal, and it would be quite as agreeable a diversion. The toothpick is properly an article of toilet and for the bathroom and the dressing room, and not for the dining room. People do not clean their nails at the table, which would be far more preferable than the opening of cavernous mouths.

The time has really come when something should be said about this disgusting toothpick fad. Better go to the dentist and have the holes plugged up with gold and cement instead of prying meat out with a toothpick. The whole thing is pandering to a low taste instead of a high one, and it is high time that it ceased to be a custom, or to be tolerated as such.—Exchange.

Mortality in the South.

By the census statistics the mortality among whites for the census year 1880 was 14.74 per 1,000 for the whole United States, including the south; and for the southern states alone, from Maryland to Louisiana inclusive, it was but 14.04 per 1,000. By the best of all demonstrations, therefore, the south is proving the salubrity of her climate, the fertility of her soil, the extent of her natural resources and her fitness for the support of a large population. An empire in extent, her lands are still not one-half occupied. Her population per square mile averages about one-third that of the average northern state, and but one-fifth that of the more populous ones.—General E. P. Alexander in Forum.

Coffee Improves with Age.

Coffee bleaches and improves with age, but old coffees, which used to be highly esteemed, are now no longer obtainable, as the prices of coffee have been so high that the planters have hurried their product to market instead of keeping it, as was often the custom in the old time. The improved facilities for transportation have also tended to the same effect. In cities like Philadelphia and New York mild coffees like Java, Mocha and Laguayra are used, while the country demands the strong Rio coffee, which constitutes the greater part of all coffee imported.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Pleasing Dollie.

Little Girl—Oh, mamma, my dollie fell down an broke her nose.

Mamma—How did she fall?

"She fell all by herself."

"How could she?"

"She was standin up."

"Then you must have stood her up."

"Yes'm."

"And then you went off and left her."

"Well, childrens don't want their mammas around all the time."—Good News.

Innumerable Chrysanthemums.

The Japanese cite 269 color varieties of the chrysanthemum, of which 63 are yellow, 87 white, 32 purple, 30 red, 31 pale pink, 12 russet and 14 of mixed colors. A fancy prevails in the country that in this flower the same tint is never exactly reproduced, and that in this it resembles the endless variety of the human countenance.—Garden and Forest.

ROSAMOND.

In her moire see her sit—
Gown of antique sheen,
Great blurred roses over it
Sunk in mossy green.

A rose her dainty corsage holds,
A rose within her hair,
And as she stirs her silken folds
A rose scent in the air.

O'er her antique, rose blurred gown
See her fingers flit,
While I envy, looking down,
Every rose of it.

I would I were a silken thread,
That they might weave of me,
Upon an antique moire bed,
A goodly rose to see.

Would I were a rose, art born,
Sunk in a fern green frond,
That, 'mong the rest, I might adorn
A gown for Rosamond.

Nay, would I were a living rose—
She'd be more soft and fond—
That I might kiss her bosom close,
Then die for Rosamond.

DRAFTY ENGLISH HOUSES.

In England Homes Are Devoid of Modern Comforts or Conveniences.

The average dwelling house in any class—upper, middle or lower—built within a year is constructed almost precisely on the lines in vogue at the beginning of the century. In England there has been in ninety years no such advance in domestic architecture, with regard to both convenience and style, as we have noted in the United States in the last decade. The Englishman may explain this by alleging that he built better in 1800 than we did in 1882. In this he will not be altogether wrong, but he will be supported by fewer facts than he imagines.

The British carpenter has not yet mastered the art of making a window. There is always a gale blowing in around the sashes during the winter, whether the outside air be calm or raging. The more heat you get in a room—and by lamps and gas you can contrive to raise the temperature—the greater is the rush of cold air from without. It forces its way around the window sashes and the doors in obedience to a natural law.

An English house is drafty, whether it be the dwelling of a peer or a peasant. The doors are hung even worse than the windows. In the first place there are no thresholds, and there is a gaping space between the floor and the bottom of the door. The room in which I am now writing has an admirable specimen of an English door. I have just measured the yawning crevices around it. Between the floor and the bottom of the door there is a space one-half an inch wide, extending across the entire breadth of the door. Around the other three sides of the door there is a space one-quarter of an inch wide. All the doors in the place (which is not the work of a "jerry builder," but is what the British call "a high class" and expensive structure) are hung in the same fashion. Imagine, then, the number of portieres and thick rugs necessary to exclude the drafts.

The halls of an English house are unheated. Drafts are accordingly increased, for the cold air will always rush from the chilly halls into the apartments of high temperature. Screens, portieres, rugs, heavy window hangings are essential in every room. Of course these things darken an apartment. Thus you can only break the currents of air in a London dwelling by adding to the depressing gloom of the almost sunless London winter.

An American housekeeper setting up an establishment here misses the numerous and capacious closets of the Yankee domicile. Closet making is an unknown art to the Nineteenth century British builder. I know of any number of new and expensive dwellings—both flats and houses—in which there is not a hanging closet. The most you can do is to provide a few cupboards in the "chimney jogs." For clothing you must have wardrobes set up in your rooms, monopolizing space and being as cheerful to gaze upon as sarcophagi. Odds and ends you must stow away as best you can. Cellars, in the American sense, are unheard of. A small dungeon for coals or a penitential cell for wines fulfills the British housekeeper's notion of a cellar. "Set tubs" are usually reserved for the "mansions of the great."

The bathroom is the latest innovation in English houses of the better class, but it is still an innovation. The clumsy tin tub, a yard and a half in width and six inches in depth, continues to be the Briton's favorite instrument for the matutinal ablution. In this unwieldy contrivance, brought into his chamber in the morning, John Bull takes his frigid splash. His aversion to bathrooms is akin to his horror of gas "above the drawing room." J. B. prefers to go to bed by candle light. He has a notion that gas will suffocate him in his sleep. Perhaps he cannot trust himself to shut off the illuminant by turning the "tap."—London Cor. Boston Herald.

Several Common Phrases.

Some of our idiomatic phrases are amusing rather than didactic. Take, for instance, the very common remark made when some one of the company has told a harmless secret—"You have let the cat out of the bag." It is at once a figure of speech and a picture, but a veritable bugbear to a foreigner not versed in the mysteries of our language. The same idea is expressed in another idiom, "You've tipped up the apple cart." A phrase that has an expressive meaning is one which epitomizes whole volumes of advice—"Keep a stiff upper lip."—Detroit Free Press.

His Chances.

"If I had half a chance I'd marry," remarked a handsome millionaire bachelor to a good looking girl.

"But you never will have," she asserted.

"Why not?" he asked, somewhat taken aback.

"Because," and she smiled in a way that fascinated him, "every chance in your case is a whole one."

It was the merest chance she took, but it netted her a million and a man.—Detroit Free Press.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9 1894

The last legislature provided for the appointment of a commission to investigate the Torrens system of transfers, and to report a bill to facilitate transfers of property similar to the plan that now prevails in Australia under that method, or some improvement of it. The commission is now in session in San Francisco, and is reported to be in favor of the Torrens system generally. Any law that will facilitate the transfer of real property without having, every time it changes hands, to incur an expensive search of title, running it down from the very beginning, and doing work over again that has been done in many cases scores of times before, will be a welcome boon to the people. Even when a trifling loan has to be had the expense of procuring a search of title bears often a proportion to the mortgage given out of all character. The Torrens system establishes the validity of a title that has been officially passed upon, down to the latest period, and as that validity is guaranteed, it is only necessary in a transfer to see that the title was sound down to the time when a new deed is to be made out. Such a law would not only cheapen materially all real estate transactions, but would materially have the effect of increasing sales, as many people with capital prefer to leave it in bank rather than involve themselves in all the difficulties, red tape, risk and expense that now surround the transfer of real estate.

If the lieutenant factory at West Point is to be kept up from year to year, let the Indian department be turned over to the Secretary of War, as it was eighty years ago. The captain or lieutenant who has charge of the Indians on a reservation has no time serving politicians or ward bosses to serve. He can go ahead and do his plain duty regardless of the Senators and Congressmen, while accepting the disagreeable part of his duty as a portion of a soldier's career. If the Indians are troublesome and annoy the frontier settlers, it then becomes necessary to to call on the army for aid. But it is much better to have them on the ground in the first place, and then there will be no mistakes to need rectification.

The seal poachers will not have the easy time this season they had last in making profitable catches. Japan, Corea and Russia have agreed to send police fleets to protect all the sealing grounds in the Pacific west of the 180th degree of longitude and north of the 35th degree of latitude. East of that the fleets of the United States and England will patrol the waters where the seals go in quest of food. If the poachers can elude all these policemen of the sea and do a thriving business, they will prove themselves irrepressible. Secretary Herbert has detailed seven wooden war vessels for the duty, and will probably reinforce them with one or two swift armored cruisers.

The U. S. Navy is gradually assuming larger proportions There will be no necessity for an aggressive foreign policy with our fleet of a respectable size and efficiency. American interests all over the world will be better protected, when it is known that the nation has a powerful fleet to back it. America will keep the peace, but must be prepared to do so with so strong a hand that nobody will attack with any degree of confidence.

The newspapers have it in their power to bring Chris Evans into camp. If they would say nothing about him for a month, he would come out of the mountains and run his neck through a noose for the sake of getting a notice.

Chinese felons are not deported, a morning paper says. It is cheaper to hang them, and the government at present has not enough money to pay its own bills.

Grover Cleveland isn't strutting around any because of the firing at Rio. We have had some Presidents who wouldn't have missed such an opportunity to emit fire, smoke and lava.

DIED.

COLLINS—At Warm Spring, February 22d, Jedediah S. Collins, a native of Ohio, aged 64 years.

Bar silver, 65¾.

G. Sanger of Alvord was in town a couple of days this week.

S. G. Sneden Esq. came down from Bishop on Wednesday's train.

Another very light fall of snow in the Valley during the week.

Silver is steadily falling in price, the latest quotation being 65¾.

The trial of Hughes and Jones this week has brought quite a number of visitors to town.

C. W. Craig expects to start for San Francisco to morrow on a visit of a couple of weeks.

Last Saturday's Examiner contains a two column article descriptive of the big meteor that fell near Candelaria last week.

The Wilson tariff bill passed the house by a large majority. The income tax clause remains a part of the bill and passed with it.

The thermometer reached 15 degrees above zero at Keeler on the 6th of last month, being the coldest day recorded this winter.

Lent began on Wednesday, and independence will cease its numerous gayaties for a season. Draw-pedro and seven-up will still be in order, however.

A specimen of the carpet weaving of Mrs. J. R. Eldred of Big Pine can be seen at the postoffice. The work is very neat and be closely woven is sure to be durable.

The honey business is quite an important item in the exports of Inyo County that bring a cash return. The industry is growing in volume and is found to be quite profitable.

George W. Childs is dead. His life was full of good deeds, his benefactions reaching out in all directions. To printers, especially, his memory will ever be held in grateful veneration.

Dr. J. S. McQueen went to Lone Pine on Monday, where he is busy on dental work. During the several years he has been practicing here Dr. McQueen has never failed to give excellent satisfaction, and we take pleasure in testifying to his ability.

Frank K. Andrews came down from Bishop on Wednesday, returning yesterday morning. Mr. Andrews had secured a carload of bee keepers supplies from the east for use by the apiarists of Owens Valley, and his business here was to deliver local orders.

A rich mining section has been recently discovered at Soda Springs below Hawthorne. Two immense ledges seven feet wide, running parallel with each other, have been uncovered and are said to be very rich in gold. This new camp may prove to be one of the richest ever discovered on the coast. They are being actively prospected, and the Gazette expects to hear from them in the early spring.—Reno Gazette.

In regard to the lower road at Camp Independence John Keegan informs us that it is the intention of Supervisor Uhlmeyer to grade the entire piece as soon as practicable. At the present time water is rising in the ground and it is impossible to work to advantage. The upper road being sandy soil is in good condition, and travel should be that way. Supervisor Uhlemeyer has endeavored to keep the roads in this section in good conditionf and his criticism in the Index was unjust.

Public Notice

I take this means of notifying S. A. Densmore that his irrigating ditch running through my land is damaging my property by making deep cuts and washes. And you are hereby notified to repair said ditch and put it in condition to prevent further damage. C. A. WALTER.

In The Super or Court.

The cases of Hughes, Jones, Islay and Payne, charged with robbing Albert C. Harwood at Bishop last November, were called for trial on Tuesday last. An order was made requiring defendants Hughes and Jones to be tried together. District Attorney Forbes moved that J. D. Lewis Esq. be admitted as associate counsel for plaintiffs. Motion denied. Walter A. Lamar Esq. was admitted as associate counsel for the defense on motion of P. H. Mack Esq., attorney for defendants. The following jury was selected and sworn to try the cases of Jones and Hughes: Benigno Aguirre, Thomas Webb, Louis Wood, F. Lawrence, A. J. Davis, J. C. Roeper, John Kispert, John Keegan, John A. Lank, H. Levy, Fred Albers and August Stecker. The prosecution examined the following witnesses and yesterday noon closed the case on behalf of the People: Albert C. Harwood, C. A. Wonacott, C. W. Garrettson, J. Farquerson, N. C. Young, Wm. Smale, F. B. Merithew, Mrs. C. W. Garrettson, J. H. Bulpitt, A. F. Smith, Oscar Smith and Robert O'Neal. Owing to the illness of Judge Gill the case has been continued until Thursday of next week.

A Truly Sky Rocket.

The following account of the big meteor is given by the Walker Lake Bulletin:

Last Thursday night about 10 o'clock this town was brilliantly illuminated by a meteoric flash. Nobody here saw the meteor, but the light lasted probably two seconds, and objects at a distance of a mile or more from town were plainly visible. At Candelaria the flash was followed by a noise like the roaring of loud thunder, and the train boys thought the boiler of the locomotive had exploded. John Swindell of Belleville says he saw the meteor. It seemed a great ball of greenish fire, and past from west to east. Reports from Sacramento say that it struck near there, and the Bodie Miner says that six men saw it fall near Bodie. Where it did strike will probably remain a mystery. Commissioner Shreve, who came down from Candelaria Sunday, says the effects of the meteor were quite startling at that place. His building trembled violently, and the town was lighted as if by powerful electric lights. Immediately after the light a terrific noise was heard, and it is the general belief that the celestial visitant struck earth not far from Candelaria.

For The Midwinter Fair.

A meeting of the Executive Committee having charge of the Inyo County exhibit at the Midwinter Fair was held at Independence Wednesday evening. It was ordered that S. A. Densmore of Independence be appointed to collect all articles intended for exhibition throughout the county, ship them to San Francisco and place them in the place secured for such display in the Agricultural building. Mr. Densmore will remain in San Francisco for a considerable time and attend to keeping the exhibit in good condition. He will make an extensive showing of his own products, which are highly creditable to the county. The sum of $250 dollars is allowed him to defray all expenses in connection with the above work except the cost of missing suitable frames, cases, etc., for the proper display of the products. Arrangements are being made to have printed a pamphlet for free distribution in connection with the exhibit. Mr. Densmore will immediately begin the work of collection.

School Benefit.

A dramatic entertainment will be given at Big Pine on the evening of February 22d, Washington's Birthday, in aid of the Fish Spring school. A drama entitled entitled "Down By the Sea," in two acts, will be presented by the following caste:

Abner Raymond ..... Lee D. Maupin
Capt. Dandelion ..... Wm. Schalten
John Gale ..... Ed. Reinhakle
September Gale ..... George Hall
March Gale ..... Walter Ober
Jean Grampeau ..... Emmons Spencer
Kate Raymond ..... Mattie L. Steele
Mrs. John Gale ..... Mrs. E. Reinhakle
Kitty Gale ..... Mrs. A. Jones

The drama will be followed by the farce "Matrimonial Sweets," by Mrs. E. Reinhakle and Walter Ober. After the entertainment a grand ball will be given, with supper at the Big Pine Hotel. Anybody who goes to Big Pine to a celebration and fails to enjoy himself must have something wrong with his liver. They do say that Arthur Smith found green toads there once but Big Pine must not be blamed for all of it. He had just come from Keeler.

Accidentally Killed.

Jedediah S. Collins met his death by a strange accident last Friday morning. He and his nephew, John L. Collins, were engaged in hauling hay from a stack that had been eaten out in under by stock. He was standing on the wagon when John Collins told him that the stack looked like falling. Upon the heels of the warning the stack fell, striking the unfortunate man on the head, breaking his neck and causing immediate death. The deceased was a native of Ohio, aged about 64 years; he was a widower and leaves one child, Miss Grace Collins. The funeral took place at Bishop on Sunday last.

Chinese New Year has been in full blast this week. The Celestials in spite of hard times, followed up their usual custom of giving lilies, candied fruits and silk handkerchiefs to their patrons.

My Heart's Delight.

By LOUISE STOCKTON.

burst into a crowing laugh, while the older child, interested, stopped whining and joined in the merriment. How did Margaret happen to have a sweet cracker in the shape of a horse in her pocket—she who abhorred "dry flour?" I think it came to her as all her other fairy gifts did, and it comforted more of us than the baby and the baby's brother. That horse cantered and walked. It hid itself, it jumped out of queer places, and was finally dissected and doled out in the most minute and everlasting particles. To see Margaret so full of resources did not surprise me. I was too much used to her fertility and freshness to wonder at it, but her light laugh, the firm gentleness with which she managed both mother and children, as though she had no other care nor thought, did make me realize that the unexpected is the woman.

I had fancied I should have to comfort and sustain her, but behold she was not only in good spirits, but she took it for granted that I shared her resolute pushing back of fears that would awaken, and before the porter came to make the beds for the night I had ceased to worry. I had not forgotten nor ignored Jack's tragedy, but I reserved my strength, and being a man healthy and tired, I slept all night and waked in the morning in good spirits and well rested. But Margaret was pale, and the lines around her mouth were drawn and dejected. Yet she roused herself, and the rest of the day bore herself cheerfully and with patience. But neither of us now remembers that day's journey. We gazed out the window and talked of what we saw, but nothing was real to us. I felt as though we had shut some horrid thing into a closet, and were holding the door to keep it in.

The day passed, the sun set, the twilight fell, and Margaret and I sat silent as we drew near our journey's end.

Tiger Hill was shrouded in mist and darkness when we entered it. By a lamp in the station a surly agent was making up a report from which he was loth to separate himself to do more than mutter that there was a hotel up the street where we might find lodgings for the night. Having thus answered he buried himself again in his papers; but looking back as we left the room I caught his eyes fixed upon us with a serious, suspicious expression that was not pleasant to me. But of this I did not speak to Margaret. She took my arm as we went out into the darkness. "Do you know," she said, "which is up and which down?"

We stood on the little platform and looked around us. The clouds had lightened enough for us to see the great hills vaguely outlined against the sky. The wind was rising and rustled in the treetops, and it seemed to us that we had been put out into the middle of a woods. Suddenly a light flared up and burned steadily away off in the distance.

"That," I said, "must be a lamp, and a lamp generally betokens a house. Don't you believe that direction is 'up?'"

"It came out of the darkness like a signal," answered the girl, "and there is nothing for us to do but to go to it. We cannot plunge into darkness without some guide."

So we stepped off the boards and went warily along a path, which was not difficult to keep, so well trodden was it. We soon discovered, as our eyes grew accustomed to the darkness, that we were going through a small woods, and when after a time we came out of it we found a pathway of boards, so narrow that we could not walk abreast, but it gave us comfort, making us sure that we were on the right road. And so after a time we came to the light, and behold, it was the hotel to which we had been so vaguely directed. The house was a small wooden affair, not overclean and smelling of tobacco, but the only smoker was a woman, who sat by a stove with a pipe in her mouth. When we entered the open door she looked up, stared a moment and then called. "Liberty!"

Whether this was the goddess or not we did not know, but there was no answer. The woman then knocked the ashes out of her pipe into the sanded box in which the stove stood, and giving her voice a higher pitch, screamed again, "Liberty!" This invocation was more successful, and a thin, pale-haired youth strolled into the room. The woman nodded toward us. The boy looked at Margaret and his whole face flushed, and indeed I do not believe his eyes had ever rested on anything so fair as this girl in her dark dress, tired and silent, standing there.

"We were told," said I, "that we could have lodging here, and we should also like some supper."

"Sit down," said Liberty, and he at once disappeared.

So we sat down side by side on an old wooden settle, and it was not many minutes before Margaret's hand stole into mine. I looked at her with apprehension, and to my surprise she said clearly and boldly:

"I am not afraid. I am only hungry."

The woman looked at her.

"Is she your daughter?" she asked.

"My niece," I promptly answered.

"She doesn't favor you," said she, and there was again silence.

After what seemed to us a very long time a man looking like a Presbyterian clergyman in a miner's clothes came in, and in his turn stared at us, gave a little nod, and he went out. Then the woman arose, took two plates from a closet, two cups and saucers and began to prepare a table for us. She spread no cloth, and she put the bacon and potatoes which she fried together upon our plates, dispensing with the formality of a meat dish. The coffee pot she pulled forward, poured some water on what was already in it and let it boil. She put bread and butter and some pickled tripe on the table and bade us come and eat. And it was not ill flavored to us. The coffee was flat and bitter, and neither one of us would have ordered fried bacon from a bill of fare; but it was all hot, and we were so in need of food, having had nothing to eat since a hasty noon meal, that the mere nourishment was comforting and helpful.

Then when we had finished the woman lighted two candles, and we arose and followed her to two reasonably clean bedrooms on the other side of the hall. After she had left us we sat down and talked.

Now that we were in Tiger hill we had no idea what to do or where to turn. But we agreed that we had best be silent, and say nothing of Jack until we knew what we should say, and to whom we should say it.

"In the morning," said I, "we will see the place and learn something of the people. There must be some one in authority here, and some one who has some sense of law. The very gossip may tell us where Jack is, and just what has happened. In the meantime we have come because I am interested in the mines, and you are my niece—as indeed, dear child, from this moment you must be."

And Margaret, leaning over, took my hand and kissed it, but I drew it away and laid it on her pretty head, and prayed to God that she might in this adventure be kept from harm and from sorrow.

And indeed it was but a few hours after that there was need of an instant answer to this prayer.

I had been asleep about an hour when suddenly I awakened. It seemed to me that something had happened to arouse me, but everything was perfectly still. The stars were now shining; I heard an owl hoot and the cry of a lonely cricket. I was just falling off to sleep again when the very skies seemed rent by a woman's scream. The sound was not in the house, it was far off and in the open air, but I instantly knew it was Margaret's voice.

Out of bed I sprang and into her room, which was empty, and her clothing was gone. On a chair by the bed stood her little satchel and a few toilet articles. It took me but a moment to fling on my clothes and dash out of the silent, dark house, and here and there I ran, trying to find some token of her, but I did not call nor speak. I am not young, but I am strong. I have been a man of temperate, athletic habits, and I have the use of a body nearly six feet in height, well knit, well kept, and when I carried fewer years I asked nothing of my strength or endurance that I did not get. But at this moment I thought of neither strength nor weakness, but I sped on, meaning to find my precious charge. I fell down, I ran into trees, I plunged into water, I tripped over stones, but nothing baffled me, and my speed was little broken. Then as I ran I became aware of sounds inarticulate, almost inaudible, which were those of the human being, and I knew I must be near a camp of some kind.

Silently, cautiously now I went, listening and following the sounds, which grew more and more distinct, and yet not intelligible, when without expecting it I suddenly came upon a sight that made my heart almost stop beating, so horrified was I! There in the light of a fire stood Margaret, in the center of some ten or fifteen ruffians. Her hat was gone, her hair was down and a shawl was fastened about her, pinioning her arms. But never saw I a girl more thoroughly angry than she, and never have I heard a more hideous jargon than these men spoke to each other. I saw that she had been brought to the entrance of a mine, and that not far off were some huts and sheds. Fortunately I was back in the shadow of the rocks, and I stood still, waiting to see what would happen and what I could do. At the moment I was powerless to do more than preserve my own freedom. It was evident that Margaret understood as little as I did what the men said, but she held herself with an erect, tense air in which there was more temper than fear.

Just then the clerical gentleman who had inspected us earlier in the night came out of the sheds, and when he perceived the plight into which Margaret had been brought he went hastily to her, and without a second's delay unfastened the shawl and freed her.

"I do not know what they meant by this. Have they hurt you?"

Margaret held out her white round wrists, on which there were red lines.

"They know so little of American girls," said she, "that they thought this would frighten me."

"You have reason enough for fright," he returned, "without any such treatment."

"I have no expectation of being afraid," said she; "and if you command this band you have, let me tell you, sir, a precious set of rascals under you."

"You need not be saucy," he replied. "It will pay you better to be honest, and tell me who sent you here."

"Surely you know all I can tell you! Where is the woman of the house in which we lodged? I suppose she is your accomplice. When she called me out of my room and asked me if I had a friend here I was frank and told her. Ask her if you want to know."

"Softer, softer, my dear," he said. "You look very pretty when you scold, but you's better be uglier and wiser."

"Where is the woman?" asked Margaret.

"She has gone home to lock your uncle in his room, to keep him from taking cold in the night air."

Margaret turned her head away, as though she meant to say she was done with him.

I adored her for her courage, but I ardently desired she might not anger him. But he treated her as though she was a petulant child, and asked her questions, from which I soon gathered that they suspected us of being spies in the employ of the owners of the mines, and that she had come with me to divert suspicion from our object. It appeared to me that they had founded all this in some confused story to which the man constantly alluded, but to which Margaret had of course no clew. And I also understood that they had laid a trap of some kind to get Margaret away by herself, hoping to wring a confession from her, and that the woman of the house had assisted them. The girl answered boldly enough, and finally said that we were friends of Mr. Lewis, and had come to be of use to him. When this was translated to the men, who never moved their eyes from the faces of the two speakers, they brutally laughed, and she for the first time lost her perfect command of herself.

There was one little man who wore a fur cap, and he displayed his knowledge of English by occasionally crying out: "Tyrant! Slave! Push ahead!" When he heard the name of Lewis he shrugged his shoulders and gave an idiotic jump into the air. It was as much as I could do not to go out and shake the little monster, but I had sense enough to keep silent and quiet. Yet it was hard work—the hardest I ever did! They bullied Margaret, they tried to terrify her into a confession, as they grew more and more convinced that she was baffling them. They mistook her innocence for assurance, her courage for obstinacy, but they did not touch her.

Then Margaret suddenly drew her shawl closer around her shoulders. "I am cold," she said, "and I am tired. I wish you would have more wood thrown on the fire and give me a seat by it." The little man, when this was translated, made a reply that was in turn translated to her, and it was that they would make up the fire and give her a seat in the middle of it. The dreadful brutality of this made her cheek pale, yet she said not a word, but turned and walked to the fire and sat down on the trunk of a fallen tree, which was evidently drawn there for a seat. For a moment her whole body relaxed, and she looked as if she could bear no more. She put out her hands to the now low fire, but in a moment rested her head on her hand like a tired child. Then she drew herself together, looked up, and did the most astonishing thing.

She began to sing—to sing in a clear, sweet, thrilling voice, which vibrated with passionate intention.

If an angel from heaven had alighted, and in his dazzling attire had stood in their midst, the men could not have been more startled, more electrified. They stood stock still gazing at her. But she gave no heed to them, but sang louder and clearer until her voice seemed to fill the air, making it pulsate with enchantment. For what was she singing? Ah, for what was she not singing! For life, for help, for freedom, and, though she knew it not, for love. Her song went soaring to the skies, and prayed to be saved from these cruel men, and it came back to earth, and begged them to be human, and not to be as the beasts, hungry for prey.

She sang like one inspired, and her whole heart went out in the cry, "Angels ever bright and fair, take, oh, take me to your care!" and the song seemed born of the night and of peril! And then, behold, from one of the huts there was a great cry, and out there rushed a man, torn, weak, bandaged, and he looked wildly about him, and seeing her he ran to her and fell prone on the ground at her side. And she lifted him up and held him in her arms, and I—I came out from my hiding place and hurried to them, and I took Jack from her and laid him down, thinking he was dead, but he opened his eyes and feebly smiled. So I sat down on the grass and held him, and Margaret knelt by him, and they looked each into the eyes of the other.

But around us there was a hubbub of confusion and quarrelling, and knives flashed and the leader pushed back one and threatened another, and the noise grew greater and more fierce, but Margaret and Jack were like people safe in a lagoon, careless of the raging storm outside. But the leader turned, holding one man by the throat, and he cried, "Sing! If you value your lives let the girl sing!"

For a moment Margaret faltered. She feared for us as she never had for herself, and she gasped as though her breath was gone, putting her hand to her throat. Then she sprang to her feet and she sang. It was a wild, fierce song like a battle cry, and she now and then clapped her hands together with a ringing sound, and she flung out her arms, looking like a prophetess calling her people to follow her to war. And then all these men struck in with a solemn slow measure that was like the tramp of feet, and their eyes flashed as they drew close together and nearer to her.

When she ended they came crowding around her, and the little man dropped on his knees and kissed the hem of her gown, and from that moment we were safe. For the song was one of their own, and an outcry against the oppressors of their country; and Margaret, who studied the songs of the peoples of the earth as others do the language, knew it, and knew how to sing it.

And so she sang through the night, sitting on the log with her hand in Jack's as he rested against me. She sang everything—gay songs and doleful, ballads, opera arias, hymns and dances. The men sat around the blazing fire, and their eyes were soft and sometimes they laughed, and every now and then they would burst into a chorus of their own. And the leader lay close to the fire and slept. Never in their lives had these men, I fancy, been more innocently happy, and never had they heard singing that so delighted them. When the morning dawned we stood up, we men wondering in our hearts whether, now that the spell was broken, we would be allowed to go, but Margaret smiled and held out her hand, and they each kissed it and then went through the woods with us.

When we parted the little man plucked a bunch of goldenrod, and giving it to Margaret, said with a friendly smile, "Push ahead."

We took his advice, and knowing there was an early train away, although it was going in the wrong direction, we went at once to the station, and when it came we took it, and all went into the baggage car, because Jack looked not only like a hero of the prize ring, but a most forlorn and neglected one.

And now need I tell how we stopped at the first town, and rested and made Jack presentable, and then traveled home in bliss and content, but that Jack and I did all the talking, while Margaret smiled at us? She was not too hoarse for that. And need I say how I got my son and lost my assistant editor and my niece, but had a daughter instead? And how Margaret paid for our lives with her singing voice, which had not yet come back to her? As for this story—how often Hale had heard it? Ask him!

THE END.

A western geologist says that Kansas can raise wheat for another 1,000 years before exhausting the necessary properties of the soil.

The Natives Had Scruples.

Once an amusing story was told me by a South sea trader, writes Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson. He had been in the habit of carrying all sorts of tinned meats, which the natives bought with avidity. Each tin was branded with a colored picture—a cow for beef, a sheep for mutton and a fish for sardines.

It happened that the firm who furnished the mutton thought it a good plan to change their labels, that their goods might be more easily distinguished from others. The mark chosen was a red dragon.

The natives came with their copra to trade as usual. The new tins were shown them, but they recoiled with horror and gave the trader to understand that they had had some religious instruction and were not to be deluded into eating tinned devil.

The trader was forced to eat his stock of mutton himself, for not a native could be persuaded to touch the accursed thing.

"More Haste, Worse Speed."

Of all the "tournaments" I ever saw, one among the "dairy maids" at an agricultural show was perhaps the last to associate itself with that heroic procedure which such a word suggests. There were about 40 of them armed with "churns" and started at the same moment to make butter against time. Each came provided with a watch, and the temptation was almost irresistable to turn the handle of the machine as quickly as possible. But no, butter must be "humored," not driven. The silent lists were filled with the provokingly deliberate "flip, flop" of 40 churns. One of the slowest combatants won the race. I never realized more plainly that "most haste is worst speed."—Cornhill Magazine.

WHEN WAR IS DECLARED

Against a man's happiness by his stomach, the enemy may be pacified and brought speedily and easily to terms. That potent regulator of digestion, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, disciplines the rebellious organ thoroughly. Indigestion arises from weakness of the stomach, and the food in it, for want of the power to digest, decomposes and acidifies, giving rise to heartburn, flatulence and pain, besides a multitude of symptoms both changeful and perplexing. But peace soon reigns when the great stomachic is resorted to and used with persistence. Dyspepsia gives rise to morbid discomposure of mind, and even sleeplessness and hypochondria in chronic cases. To the complete dismissal of these the Bitters is fully adequate. Liver complaint, constipation, debility, rheumatism and malaria are completely subdued by this genial medicine.

A vigorous young man expends enough energy in one foot-ball game to saw a whole cord of stove wood.

Telegraphing Without Wires.

The problem of a "telegraph without wires" has often been broached, but, so far as I know, even the theoretical realization of this project has never been seriously attempted until recently, when Mr. Edison gave forth his views regarding the matter. It would seem that Mr. Edison has actually patented "means for transmitting signals electrically without the interposition of connecting wires." What he has to say regarding this subject is well worth our attention. He begins with the announcement of his discovery that, if a sufficient elevation be obtained to overcome the curvature of the earth, and to reduce as far as may be the earth's absorption, electric signaling may be carried on by induction without the use of wires connecting the distant points of signaling stations.

For signaling across oceans, says Mr. Edison, this method will be very serviceable, inasmuch as it does away with the use of submarine cables; while for communication between vessels at sea, or between vessels at sea and points on land, the invention would be equally important. There is also no obstacle to its employment between distant points on land, but in the latter case it is necessary to increase the degree of elevation or height from which the signaling operations are conducted, because of the induction absorbing effect of houses, trees and hills.

Mr. Edison states that at sea he can communicate electrically to a great distance from a height of 100 feet. This height could be secured from the mast of a ship, so that signals could be sent from ship to ship, and communication be established, in this way, even over oceans themselves.—Dr. Andrew Wilson in Illustrated London News.

Queer Lobsters.

Visitors to Portland pier who happened to drop into the lobster house of Mr. Lewis McDonald were favored with a view of a bright blue lobster. This lobster was caught off Cape Elizabeth by a Peak's island fisherman, and yesterday was still alive. The color was decidedly different from the green of the ordinary lobster. On the back the blue was of that deep variety that belongs to indigo, and toward the extremities and under parts shaded off to a faint, but still unmistakable tint, and thence into a pure white. The under part of one of the claws is almost a pure white. The lobster is about eleven inches long. One claw is full size, while the other is very small. It is said that one other blue lobster has been caught off the cape this season. Mr. McDonald thinks of preserving the specimen.

He has also a pure white lobster, caught about five years ago and preserved in alcohol. Mr. McDonald thinks it is the only pure white lobster ever caught.—Portland (Me.) Press.

A Big Peach Crop Predicted.

If the experts who have recently been examining the orchards in the fruit sections of New Jersey have read the indications correctly, the peach harvest of the coming season will be of a phenomenal nature. They say the glut of 1891 will seem insignificant compared with the colossal crop impending.

The farmers for the most part are a little skeptical about this prediction. They say a good fruit year is almost invariably followed by a bad one; but prudent housewives, remembering that last season the hogs were fed upon peaches and vast quantities of the luscious fruit were allow to rot, because there were not sufficient cans to hold it, are taking time by the forelock and providing themselves with preserving vessels far in advance of the promised harvest. The canning establishments, too, will be prepared to do an enormous business.—New York Times.

The Snake Was Too Slow.

With the approach of spring flowers and mild weather the crop of Georgia snake stories begins to increase. The latest comes from Albany, in that state, and is to the effect that two or three days ago a Mr. Watson, a reputable citizen, stepped on a big rattler. All that saved the man from being bitten was that the snake had just begun to swallow a rabbit and hadn't had time to get the morsel down. The snake struggled first to complete its meal, in order to get in its fine work on Mr. Watson, and then, failing in that, tried to disgorge the rabbit, but before it could accomplish its purpose was killed.—Exchange.

Argentine a Good Market.

A settler in Diamante, Entre Rios, Argentine Republic, writes that over eighty reaping machines and forty-five thrashing machines were received in that locality last year, while the cost of the twine used for binding wheat amounted to $60,000, and estimates that this year $150,000 worth of twine will be used. He says that the settlers this year will need 600,000 bags. Within the last two months Diamante has purchased $582,000 worth of agricultural machinery. The yield of wheat during the past season has averaged almost a ton an acre, and is of a superior quality.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A Bottomless Cavern.

There is an extensive cave in Gilford township. Six rooms have been visited. In one of these there is a rift several feet wide, extending downward to an unknown depth. A stone dropped therein cannot be heard to strike a bottom. Some interesting mineralogical specimens can be found in the cave. It will be explored as thoroughly as possible some time this spring.—Cor. St. Paul Pioneer-Press.

E. R. Watson, of Arcadia, Ga., has been made happy by the return of his milch cow that disappeared over two years ago, during which time he never heard of her.

The figures of the last census are not yet completed, but it is estimated that about 17,000,000 persons derive their living from agriculture—that is, about 22 per cent.

DEATH IN STORMS

Pitiless Work of the Terrible Giant Twins, Wind and Wave.

WORLD'S MOST POPULOUS CEMETERY

How Cruel at Times Seems the Ocean.—The Land Where "There Shall be No More Sea."

And there was no more sea.—Revelation xxi, 1.

What a strange mystery the ocean is! Sometimes it holds your little craft as tenderly as a mother holds her child, and you wonder that the charge of caprice can be brought against it. At other times it is like an angry ogre who has a tyrant's power and uses it like a tyrant.

It is a marvelous sight, a spectacle of thrilling magnificence which makes the blood tingle, to stand on the beach at such a time and watch the serried columns of white capped rollers dash themselves to pieces on the sands. They remind you of Napoleon's army at Waterloo, which had wandered over Europe with victorious banners, which dreamed of no force which could resist its progress, but suddenly found itself face to face with its master, and then, with uncontrolled madness, threw itself to death as well as to defeat. The huge array of white capped monarchs, thinking themselves invincible, attack the shore with ferocious energy and pound themselves to spray. The heart beats wildly as this great battle between sea and land fills the air with thunder, and poet and painter come from far to witness the conflict and describe its glories with pen and brush.

But how cruel the ocean can be when it catches our craft at a disadvantage! Wind and waves in unholy alliance, a compact of death, make the world's cheek blanch with horror as the work of destruction goes on. These twin giants seem to be moved by a common hatred of whatever floats, and as though every vessel was an intruder on their domain tear it to pieces and doom it to disaster. The sails are cut into tatters, their masts are torn away as though the rigging were made of pack thread, and the huge hull is either sent to the bottom or thrown high on the beach in disdain. The sun in very pity creeps behind the veiling clouds for awhile, and when it shines again, after the waves have subsided and the tempest has spent itself, the coast is strewn with wrecks and many a brave sailor lies with upturned face on the sands.

That was sad news which flashed over the wires one Thursday morning. One story followed on the heels of another until disaster seemed to be multiplied by itself, and each account was more pitiful than the last. A fisherman outrode the gale for awhile and then went down with all hands; a sturdy freighter off Hatteras was dismasted, sprang a leak and sank, leaving only one survivor to tell the tale; scores of lesser craft were torn from their anchorage, and the Jersey shore was literally stewn with wreckage. Other vessels which had managed to outlive the hurricane were towed into harbor, either the captain or part of the crew missing.

The book of Revelation tells us that in that other country from whose bourne no traveler returns "there shall be no more sea," and on this Sunday morning we breathe a sigh of relief over the statement. We can dispense with its magnificence if we may be rid of its dangers. It has devoured millions of property and is the most populous cemetery on the planet. When the sea gives up its dead, a countless multitude of the lost will reappear.

But we are specially impressed with the lesson which the great storm emphasizes—namely, the uncertainty of life. On the ocean the unexpected happens more frequently than elsewhere. At one moment a cloudless sky and a musical ripple along the vessel's side. The long roll lifts the craft, which lazily yields to the rhythmic motion of the waters. But danger is in ambush, and after a little the puff of wind grows stronger, the long roll is plumed with a white crest, the tempest sounds its trumpet, and the rigging, like the strings of an æolian harp, emits a mournful note like that of a dirge. In another half hour the whole artillery of nature is at work, the moaning vessel is thrown on her beam ends and creaks and groans as though crying for mercy. In another hour there is nothing visible except some struggling sailor clinging to a spar.

However, death has many ways of achieving its purpose. Not on the sea alone, but on the land, it does its daily stint, and it behooves us to remember that sooner or later it will have something to say to us. "All men may die, but I shall live," is the dream of heedlessness. "All men must die, and therefore I," is the fact that is to be recognized and prepared for.

But we can become indifferent even to this "last enemy." It is not the glum indifference of desperate despair, but the cheerful indifference of perfect faith. If we have no place to go to, it is hard to contemplate our exit. But if there is a better place, a residence in which will be added happiness, we may even shake hands with Death, tell him that our latchstring is always out and he will be welcome whenever he sees fit to come. It is the fear of taking a leap in the dark that bids us pause. But if we are sure of taking a leap into the light we can easily let go our hold on this rugged life and drop into the life to come. The sea may rage as it pleases if our next port of entry is heaven, and lurking accidents and diseases may come out of their hiding places into the open, for at the worst they can only do us a good turn by opening the door of a larger and better house to live in.—New York Herald.

Horse Power.

The usual work of a horse is taken at 22,500 pounds raised one foot per minute for eight hours per day. A horse will carry 250 pounds twenty-five miles per day, eight hours. An average draft horse will draw 1,600 pounds twenty-three miles a day on a level road, weight of wagon included.—Humane World.

Tact in a Hostess.

Tact as the distinctive characteristic of social breeding has been seldom shown to better advantage than by two ladies of noted hospitality, Mrs. William C. Whitney, of New York, and Mrs. George S. Studwell, of Brooklyn. The circumstances were nearly the same in each case.

Mrs. Whitney was presiding over a dinner party in her own house. About a score of guests were present and the service included china of the most exquisite foreign manufacture. With the appearance of the fruit one of these priceless plates was placed before each guest. Their beauty attracted general admiration, and one young man, seated opposite his hostess, nervously dropped his knife upon his plate and it was broken. Conversation was hushed instantly and all eyes were turned toward Mrs. Whitney, who was thus forced to take some notice of the accident.

"Permit me to apologize, Mr. ——," she said, "for the fragile nature of these plates. One would easily suppose that they were made to be broken. The slightest jar is sufficient." And as she spoke she tapped with her fruit knife upon her own until it fell in fragments, whereupon conversation was resumed.

Mrs. Studwell, of Pierrepont street, Brooklyn, has a superb table service of silver and Bohemian glass, embossed with gold, with which she entertains her friends. This ware includes appropriate glasses for half a dozen varieties of wine and liquors. Dinner was over and she was holding up for inspection a water goblet, as delicate and beautiful as a rainbow tinted bubble, when it slipped from her fingers and was shattered upon the carpet.

"Well," she remarked, with a sad glance at the shining pieces, "I ought certainly to rejoice that I broke that glass myself, for had some of you anticipated me I should have been compelled, like poor Mrs. Whitney, to restore the entente cordiale by breaking another."—New York Herald.

An African Traveler in New York.

Mrs. M. French-Sheldon was a guest at the last social meeting of the Twelfth Night club, and so captivated the young women of that organization that exclamations of "Isn't she sweet?" "Perfectly charming!" and "Just dear!" floated out from the corners even after she was gone. Being urged to speak she told in a graceful, unassuming manner some very interesting anecdotes of her African experience. She thinks these so called savages are a gentle, kindly disposed people and simple minded as children. They are very fond of brass ornaments, with which they load themselves down sometimes even to the extent of sixty pounds weight.

One of the native women, seeing that the white stranger's hands were unadorned, said pityingly, "Poor lady!" and immediately stripped her own fingers of their many brass rings and bestowed them on her. "The sentiment was so sweet and sisterly," said Mrs. French-Sheldon, "that I put them on. But I disliked to do it, for they were very dirty."—New York Letter.

Where Working Girls Meet.

The New Orleans women have a Business Woman's exchange. The idea belongs to Mrs. Leon Jastremski, who noticed the assembling of a group of girls at luncheon time in the rear of a little store, and concluded that a place where women might rest, lunch and refresh themselves would be welcomed by all women who are employed. Two large rooms were secured, were lighted and furnished with lounges, easy chairs, growing plants and newspapers in the way women most like. Attached to this is a kitchen where soup, tea, coffee and chocolate are to be served at low prices. For the privileges of the exchange women pay from six dollars to twelve dollars a year, and it is open to all women for a fee of twenty-five cents a month, or two cents a single visit. It has a daily attendance of from fifty to seventy-five girls and women.—New Orleans Letter.

The Truth About Trains.

Scavenger's skirts is the latest title of honor to be applied to those disgusting, uncleanly abominations that the autocrat Fashion tries to make us say we like.

Now, what woman who is decent, not nice, mind you, or particularly refined, but just plain decent, can enjoy trailing her gown through the various unmentionable kinds of filth that coat trains, horse cars and station platforms? Mind, I don't say streets, because nearly everybody picks up her gown in the streets. It is a caddish thing anyway, because everybody who knows anything at all knows that the train dress is designed for carriage wear and is especially intended to swing forward about the feet and gracefully obviate the necessity of a lap robe when on park parade.—American Dairyman.

Peep at a Child Wife in India.

A Portland lady, who is now on her way home from India, writes to a friend that she had a good opportunity to witness one of the ceremonies peculiar to that far land—a marriage of a girl child to a middle aged man. In this instance the bride, who was of high social rank, was regarded by her people as really old, having reached her twelfth year. Etiquette requires that the bride shall not be seen to smile or take notice of any person for a period of three days. But the Portland lady was determined that she would see how the downcast face looked, and finally got down on her knees upon the same mat upon which the richly attired bride sat and took a good look up into her face.—Bangor (Me.) Commercial.

Single Women Retaliate.

There has been recently a unique ladies' strike in Germany in one of the garrison towns. The conduct of the men, who totally neglect the unmarried ladies in order to dance with the wives of their friends and acquaintances, displeased the slighted maidens and their mothers, and at the last regimental ball not an unmarried girl was present.—Berlin Letter.

A SMART BEAR.

The Beast Started a Locomotive and Blew the Whistle.

KEPT THE TRAIN OUT OF A SMASHUP

An Engineer's Interesting Tale.—If you Don't Believe it Read the Thrilling Story.

When the C. F. and W. W. railroad was built, years ago, four miles of the track passed through an unbroken piece of forest known locally as the Bear Den woods. The name was due to the fact that a seamed and rocky ledge, extending diagonally across the wild stretch, was a favorite lodging place for bears, which were numerous in that region then, and in fact still hold their own there in numbers sufficient to be a source of much annoyance to the farmers who strive for a living on the borders of the woods. The road connected Chilton Forks with the settlements at Wigton's Willows, a distance of twenty-eight miles, and was built to develop the timber and coal resources of the region. I was the engineer of the construction train during the building of the road, and it was a common sight to see bears come out of the woods at frequent points along the line and inspect with ludicrous curiosity the strange work that was going on in their domain. We got so we didn't mind them any more than we might so many pigs grunting along the track.

The railroad was completed toward the end of the summer, and a day was set for running the first train over it from Chilton Forks to the Willows. There was a long trestle a mile west of Gravely's station which carried the road over a ravine that was more than a hundred feet deep. The track went onto the trestle from a very sharp curve, and the trestle was not entirely finished, so that no train or engine could yet be run over it with safety, except with very slow and careful motion.

The day the train was to be run the section foreman discovered that a piece of track near the eastern extremity of the Bear Den woods could be bettered considerably by a little more filling in and ballasting, and as everybody on the work had to be a sort of general utility man, he sent my fireman and me with a carload of gravel to bolster up the weak spot. The job was a bigger one than it was thought, and when we had finished the work it was almost time for the excursion train to be coming along.

In fact we had heard the locomotive whistling at Cherry Run, two miles east of us. We had also heard the mutterings of one of those fierce storms that were common in the region. By the time we had got on the engine and were preparing to pull out for Gravely's the storm came howling down worse than any I had seen since I had been on the road. We could hear the trees crashing down before it, and as I jumped in the cab a big limb from a hemlock came swooping square on the engine, and pinned me down between the tender and the cab and held me there as if I were in a vise. The fireman had stepped up on the coal in the tender, and the same fearful gust that bore the limb down on me caught him and whipped him out of the tender as if he had been a bundle of straw, and I heard him drop in the brush off to one side of the track. He didn't come back and I supposed he was killed.

There I lay perfectly helpless, and knew that the train with all the officers of the road and their friends aboard was booming along, and that in less than two minutes it must come dashing at full speed upon my engine. The inevitable result of such a catastrophe was terrible to think about. The storm was now raging frightfully through the woods. Trees were falling on every side, and I could almost feel my hair turning gray. As I lay there, struggling to free myself, a bear, terror stricken by the awful commotion in the woods and hurrying to escape from its fury, came climbing into the cab, and stumbling over the butt of the heavy limb that pinned me to the floor, tumbled against the furnace door. The bear scrambled to his feet and went pawing wildly about in the cab. But I gave no thought to the bear, for mingling with the tumult of the storm I heard the rumble and tremor of the approaching train on the rails.

Suddenly I heard a familiar click, and instantly the engine started forward with a bound. I turned my head and looked at the lever. The bear, in his aimless clutching about in the cab, had caught it with his paws and had 'pulled her wide open.' The track was down grade all the way to Gravely's, and, great heaven! how we flew! The excursion train was right behind us, I knew, and in a few seconds more would have crashed into my engine. But that great horror was escaped, and, although I was pinned down by the limb and had a bear for a pilot, I almost fainted with joy.

Down that grade we flew like the wind that was howling all around us. The thumping and rolling of the locomotive seemed to make the bear wild with excitement, and he pranced about in the cab like a crazy person. Then of a sudden the sharp curve and the dangerous trestle beyond Gravely's flashed across my mind. At the rate we were going, even if we rounded the curve all right, we would strike that trestle at a mile a minute, and down we should go to the bottom of that ravine, 100 feet below!

With this new horror fresh upon me the engine flashed out of the woods into the open country. Just a mile and a half more to the trestle, and I couldn't see how anything on earth could save us. As we tore by the little station at Gravely's the bear in his prancing and clutching caught sight of the whistle cord. That excited his curiosity, and he seized it and gave it a lusty pull. The whistle responded with a shriek that startled even me. Its effect on the bear was electric. He tumbled over backward and fell across the butt of the limb that held me down. His weight tipped it up and lifted the other end off of me. The bear rolled out of the cab to the ground and I was freed from the limb. I crawled to the lever, reversed it and fainted. When I came to I was lying on the ground with men around me. The pilot of the locomotive was half its width on the trestle.

It has always been a sorrow in my life that the bear that saved my life and the lives of many others that day was killed by his fall from the cab. My fireman was badly hurt by his sudden voyage through the air, but lived to run many a trip with me on the old C. F. and W. W.—New York Sun.

A Stranger's Peculiar Whim.

A stranger entered the Newtown (Kan.) postoffice one day last week and, buying a quantity of postage stamps, asked permission to stamp all letters that the office was holding for postage. His request was granted, and he departed saying that it was a charitable fad he had to go about the country supplying the neglect of thoughtless people.

An Unreasonable Mermaid.

"This here show business," said the dime museum man, "ain't what it's cracked up to be by a long shot. A man's allus runnin agin things that do him up."

"What's troubling you?" inquired the advance agent.

"Why, that durn mermaid of mine is gettin me into debt over my head. Now, you know I've got the only genuine mermaid on exhibition. She's a maid of the sea, she is, a living example of the storied nymphs of the wave of old, as my programmer says. I pay her a big salary, and she puts all my other attractions in the shade. It would put your eye out to see the way the people look at her. I tell you, she's the greatest freak in the business, and the best of it is she's genooine. But to come down to cases, as I wuz saying, she keeps me in hot water all the time. There ain't a day that I don't have to do somethin special for her. I don't dast refuse, for I can't get along without her in these dull times. Sometimes, though, she makes me crazy by her unreasonable requests. What do you suppose she wants now?"

"Couldn't imagine," replied the advance agent, "unless it is fresh sea water every day or something like that."

"Huh!" said the dime museum man disgustedly, "that would be easy. That durn mermaid don't want a thing but a pair of button white kid shoes."—Buffalo Express.

A Conversation by Noted Authors.

"I never heard distinguished people talk among themselves but once," declared a young lady the other day, "but then I was quite satisfied. It was even more interesting than I had expected."

"What did they talk about?" asked her companion curiously, "and who were they?"

The young lady named them—two noted authors, a gentleman and a lady. "And they talked," she added, with a smile, "about pokers."

"Pokers?" ejaculated the friend incredulously.

"Pokers!" repeated the first speaker firmly. "The authoress had just built a new house, and her furnace did not work well. She thought her companion had one of the same kind in the house and asked about it.

"He gave her information and advice, and then they branched off to pokers and the iniquity of manufacturers who make them of soft iron so that they bend out of shape the first time they are red hot. You have always heard, haven't you, that his style is exquisite and his English singularly clear and vigorous? Well, it is so, I assure you, when he talks of pokers, and she is charming when she talks in a humorous vein about back dampers and cold air boxes. I was delighted with the entire conversation, though it certainly was not what I anticipated."—Youth's Companion.

Two Remarkable Cures.

An old Irish woman's cow was sick unto death, so she turned to the priest to save it. "I can't do anything to keep your cow from dying," he said impatiently.

"Fath an begorra it's you that can if any one can," the answered in simple faith.

Unwilling to have her reverence in him shaken, the old man went to her cabin. The sick cow was brought out into the yard and propped up, then the priest began a solemn march around it, chanting monotonously, "If you die, you die; if you live, you live." When at last the tired priest sat down, the cow was reviving, and it afterward lived to a green old age. Some years later the priest was at the point of death with a terrible quinsy, when the old Irish woman presented herself at the house and told the doctor she could cure him. She was laughed to scorn, but at last had her own way. She insisted upon having the dying man's bed brought out into the middle of the floor, and around it she slowly cantered, singing, "If you live, you live, and if you die you die." The humor of the situation tickled the suffering priest so that a hearty laugh broke the quinsy, and he also lived—to a green old age.—Springfield Homestead.

Power of the Imagination.

"I never was more firmly convinced of the power of imagination," said a man, "than I was by something that happened to me on the occasion of a visit to a friend. It had been an extremely hot day, and when I went to bed at night the heat seemed almost insupportable. It seemed to me that if I should open the door from my room into the hall it would make a little circulation and make the air more comfortable, and I felt safe in doing this because I am an early riser, and I knew I could get the door shut before anybody was stirring in the morning. So I opened the door, with the pleasant result that I had anticipated, and when I went to close it in the morning I found that I had opened not the door into the hall, but the door into a closet."—New York Sun.

A Plea For Egoism.

Ask yourself hard questions about yourself; find out all you can about yourself. Ascertain from original sources if you are really the manner of man you say you are; if you are always honest; if you always tell the square, perfect truth in business deals; if your life is as good and upright at 11 o'clock at night as it is at noon; if you are as good a temperance man at a fishing excursion as you are at a Sunday picnic; if you are as good when you go out of the city as you are at home; if, in short, you are really the sort of man your father hopes you are and your sweetheart believes you to be.—Panola (Tex.) Watchman.

What an Old Lady Fears.

"I'm almost afraid sometimes," said a white haired woman at a club meeting not long ago, "when I see the attention given to athletics, the Delsarte system, physical culture or whatever name under which the enthusiasm exists that the coming woman is going to be a superb animal—nothing more."—New York Times.

WITH FINGER TIPS

How Helen Keller, a Blind and Deaf Mute was Taught to Read.

METHOD OF HER INSTRUCTRESS.

A Beautiful Face That Mirrors a Soul Which Knows Naught of the Appearance of Sin.

The most interesting feature of the educational congress was the appearance of Helen Keller under the kind and skillful guidance of Miss Annie M. Sullivan, her teacher. When a babe, Helen Keller became blind, deaf and dumb. When Miss Sullivan, a young woman of unusual beauty of form and feature, stood before the audience beside a girl who, except for the sad sign of blindness in the large eyes, gave promise of still greater beauty, her face glistening with a rapture that painters try to express in the ecstacy of angels, hearts seemed to stand still. It was a face that had never consciously looked on the distortions of passion or pain—the mirror of a soul that could not imagine the outward appearance of sin nor remember any of the discords of life.

In her presence it was hard to appreciate the fact that her world lay within ours, without sun, music or speech. No one who saw it will forget the impulsive fluttering of her young, white hand as it sought her teacher's face or round, white throat; the satisfaction when the contact of her delicate white finger tips gave her what sight gives us; the flash of light over her face when, with her forefinger resting on her teacher's lip, she read the answer to the question she had asked by the twinkling digital movements in her teacher's palm. There were those who wept when she repeated audibly, with a depth of feeling she alone can feel:

Tell me not in mournful numbers
Life is but an empty dream.

All were invited to ask questions, yet not many did so. The occasion seemed sacred.

"How did you teach her the first word?" some one ventured at last.

"Her first word was 'doll,'" was the answer. "I gave her the doll, placed her finger on my lip and spoke the word. When she wearied of the doll, I took it from her, and when I returned it again gave the movement of the lips. The second word was 'mug.' I used the cup from which she drank, but became convinced that she had not a clear idea of the name, but that it meant to her also water or drink. So I one day took her to the pump, and as the water was flowing into her cup had her hold her hand in the stream, and then putting her finger on my lip gave her the word 'water.' Then I again gave her the word 'mug.' The idea that everything had a name, the comprehension of nouns, was a great revelation to her and came then and all at once. She was greatly excited. A nurse, with the baby sister in her arms, was standing near. Helen immediately put her hand on its face to know its name. I told her 'baby,' and she caught it at once. Then she stooped down and patted the ground to know what it was called. She learned many words that day, and those words she never forgot.'

"How soon after she learned words did she frame sentences?"

"Immediately."

"Were verbs harder to learn than nouns?"

"Not at all. I began with such words as 'sit,' 'stand' and the like that were easy to illustrate. Prepositions troubled her most."

"How does she get an idea of the abstract?"

"I cannot tell. It seems to be with her, or it comes."

"Has she any distinguishing sense of musical vibrations?"

"Yes, very distinct. She likes music."

"Is her vocabulary large?"

"Very large. She expresses herself fluently and is choice of words."

"What books does she like best?"

Every now and then the white fingers fluttered to the teacher's face for just one delicate touch—a finger look it was—and now they rested on Miss Sullivan's lip:

"Tell—the—people—what—books—you—like—best."

Helen's face was an open book of her mental processes. She repeated each word after Miss Sullivan, but hesitated a little on the words "tell" and "you," the brightness of her face dimming for the instant. As soon as she comprehended the question, which she did in advance of its completion, the flash of intelligence came, and when she turned toward the audience, for she did not seem at any time to lose her location, she said with spirit:

"Oh, I have read so much that it is very hard to say what I like best, but"—waiting a moment—"'Little Lord Fauntleroy'"— And then followed rapidly the names of several works, some of which, it would seem, could hardly be understood by any one who cannot know sound and color.

"How do you read?"

"By raised letters and by my teacher."

"I noticed when you pronounced for her you articulated with an exaggerated motion of the lips," said one. "Is not that necessary?"

"Her teaching was begun in that way. I do not think it is necessary or best. I attribute the peculiarity of her voice to that mechanical action which she uses. I think it would have been better and just as easy if she had been spoken to with the usual movement."

In reply to the question of her knowledge of the abstract, General Futon remarked that the greatest development in the case of Helen Keller was that of the spiritual.—Memphis Appeal-Avalanche.

Playing Horse.

A wealthy hermit who dwelt near Springfield, O., has started for western Indiana with a cart made from old buggy wheels and shafts, to which he himself was harnessed as though he was a horse. A large dog accompanied him as a bodyguard.

How Robin Got a Drink.

That was a charming object lesson which was noticed in the yard at the "Hickories" up Windsor avenue yesterday forenoon, and it was an instructive lesson in helping one's self as well. Midway between the house and barn is located a large cask as a drinking place for the horses. Usually, of course, this tub is nearly full, but at the time referred to the water lacked quite a little of reaching the top. Along came a robin, spinning over the ground like mad, only stopping for a moment, as is his wont, to listen. Reaching the tub, he quickly vaulted to the edge. A look of disappointment was visible when he arched his pretty neck so that one eye could look down at the water. It was too far away, and the bird trotted around quite ill at ease.

The faucet was leaking just a trifle—only a drop at a time—drop, drop, drop—and the robin's eye finally caught the crystals, and the little fellow almost shouted for joy as he danced around to that side of the tub. Placing himself directly underneath the outlet, he threw his head back, opened his beak, and thereafter each drop landed in his parched throat. More than a dozen drops disappeared down the narrow channel. Then the robin bowed his head just a little so that the cooling drops landed on top of it and trickled down on either side. Then he flew away to a neighboring tree as contented and happy as if at peace with all the world.—Hartford Courant.

Fevers of Hot Countries.

Dr. Domingos Freire, whose researches on yellow fever have attracted much attention, has demonstrated the fact that the bilious fever of hot countries is a distinct disease from yellow fever, that the symptoms are entirely different, and that the bacteriological causes are also distinct. As regards symptoms, he finds that in yellow fever there are three separate periods—namely, a period of hyperpyrexia, which lasts for 28 or 48 hours; a short and variable period of apyrexia, and a recurrent hyperpyrexia, during which the phenomenon of hemorrhage and the ataxoadynamic symptoms appear. The icterus comes on during the second or third period, and sometimes even only after death.

Yellow fever is contagious and does not usually recur. There is no enlargement of the spleen except where there has been antecedent malaria, and it is entirely intractable to the use of quinine and to salts. In bilious fever there is a regular periodic advance, sometimes intermittent, sometimes remittent. In the first case with marked irregular exacerbations, in the second with febrile exacerbations, which generally occur toward evening or during the night.

Pen Names of French Journalists.

French journalists commonly sign their articles with a pen name. There is now on exhibition in the galleries of the Rue de Seze, in Paris, a portrait exhibition of eminent journalists past and present signed by their pen names, and the public of Paris is taking great interest in identifying the personalities by their pictures. Jules Simon is a name so familiar to us, for instance, since this journalist has also been a prime minister and is an academician, that few probably know that it is not his real name, but it is said he came into the world as Joseph Schweitzer. Among the other names one notes that "Jacques St. Cere" of Figaro, who signs the articles on foreign affairs, is a Gallicized German named Rosenthal. "M. de St. Genest," whose articles in Figaro are as aristocratic in tone as his pen name, is really possessed of the plebeian name of Boucheron. "Jacqueline" of Gil Blas is Mme. Severin. "Valbert" of The Revue des Deux Mondes is the novelist and Academician Victor Cherbuliez.—Philadelphia Press.

Looking Glasses In Coffins.

One of the ancient customs connected with Swedish funerals was to place a small looking glass in the coffin of an unmarried female, so that when the last trump sounds she might be able to arrange her tresses. It was the practice for Scandinavian maidens to wear their hair flowing loosely, while the matrons wore it bound about the head and generally covered with some form of cap. Hence the unmarried woman was imagined as awakening at the judgment day with more untidy locks than her wedded sisters and more in need of a glass.—Westminster Review.

A Real Old Bible.

A family in Utica possesses a Bible which was printed in London in 1630, and which is consequently 263 years old. There are older Bibles, but this one is remarkable from the fact that it has been in possession of the same family for generations. It is a small book, 6 inches long, 5 inches wide and 2 inches thick. The binding is heavy calfskin. The heavy leather binding is worn away in several places, showing that the book has been put to a practical use.—New York Tribune.

An Easy Cure For a Sore Throat.

According to an old Anglo-Saxon formula for quinsy, you need only press the throat with the thumb and the ring and the middle fingers, cocking up the other two, and tell the disease to be gone.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16..... 1894

It would be impossible to give a more striking illustration of the fact that the depreciation in the value of silver and the fall in the value of farm productions go hand in hand, than has been given with such marked emphasis in the past few days. Wheat has reached the lowest notch in the price list it has ever been known to fall to before, and silver is now quoted in its relation to gold at a greater discount than has before occurred in the history of the white metal. How well this proves the position of the most accurate thinkers, who have all along told us that, measured by the prices of staple commodities, silver is as high as it was when both metals were at par with each other. Silver will buy as much wheat now as it would any time in the past. But compared with the purchasing power of silver in wheat, gold has increased in value. As the value of the absolute necessities—and wheat is their best representative—keep pace with the value of silver, this great fact shows that silver is the true measure of values, whilst gold has been artificially made a metal of capricious and unstaple value. The very first lesson in economy is that actual intrinsic value can only lie in the natural and indispensable productions—productions without which man could not exist. That money, then, is the only true measure of value which rises and falls with the valve of these productions.

Emperor William has developed a marked partiality for Prince Bismark of late. Although the conclusion would seem to be far-fetched, this to us looks as if the young war lord were getting ready to try conclusions with France and Russia. There is a great deal of sound policy in arranging the quarrels in your own household before engaging in hostilities with your neighbors. Some of the most distinguished statesmen in Europe are on record to the effect that the strain cannot last much longer, nor can it. Bismark's friendship and co-operation are worth much to the young ruler at any time, but particularly in the event of war. It is a long time since the clash of arms has been heard in Europe on any considerable scale, the Russo-Turkish war being the last occurrence of the kind. Meanwhile, armies have gone on increasing, and national debts and imposts of all kinds have gone on expanding, at a perfectly intolerable rate. Unless held together by war the triple alliance threatens to fall to pieces of its own weight. It has always been a simple question of time when hostilities should break out, and the time seems near.

The House and the Senate seem to be at variance in regard to the policy which should control in disposing of public lands. A majority of the Senate Committee on public lands is composed of Western men, whereas a majority of the House Committee is composed of Eastern representatives. The former are inclined to be liberal, while the latter are disposed to pursue a conservative policy. It would be well to bear in mind that the public lands are in the West rather than in the East. East of the Mississippi river there is, in fact, very little land belonging to the national government. It is natural, therefore, that the Western Senators should understand the question of public land distribution better than Eastern Representatives. They know what the settlement of the West calls for, and what the West demands in this connection may be said to be in the interest of the whole nation. Eastern people should follow the lead of the West in all matters relating to the disposition of public lands.

The following States will elect Governors this fall: Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Kansas, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, North Dakota, Oregon, Pennsylvaina, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Texas, Tennessee, Wyoming and Wisconsin.

Ordinance No. 50.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every male person over twenty-one and under fifty five years of age, found in each Road District of the County of Inyo, State of California, between the first day of March, 1894, and the thirty first day of December, 1894, excepting all persons who were honorably discharged from service in the army or navy of the United States, at any time between the first day of April, in the year A. D. 1861, and the first day of September, A. D. 1865, and who have not paid the same in some other road district, must pay to the said County of Inyo, a road poll tax of two dollars.

SECTION 2. Said road poll tax shall be collected by the Assessor of the said County of Inyo, in the same manner that State Poll Taxes are collected, and shall be paid to the Treasurer of the said County of Inyo and shall be placed to the credit of the several road districts of the said County of Inyo from which said road poll tax was collected.

SECTION 3. This Ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and Ordinance No. 46 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 9th day of January, 1893, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances and parts of Ordinances of said Board in conflict here with are hereby repealed.

SECTION 4. This Ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said County of Inyo, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty five days.

Ordinance No. 51.

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, Do Ordain As Follows:

SECTION 1. Every person engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding or pasturing sheep in the County of Inyo, State of California, must annually procure a license therefor from the Tax-Collector of said Inyo County, and must make therefor the following payment:

1. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five thousand sheep or more shall constitute the first class, and must pay Two Hundred and Fifty Dollars per annum for the first five thousand sheep, and for every additional thousand sheep the sum of Fifty Dollars per annum.

2. Those owning and having in their possession and under their control four thousand sheep and less than five thousand constitute the second class, and must pay Two Hundred Dollars per annum.

3. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand five hundred sheep and less than four thousand constitute the third class and must pay One Hundred and seventy-five Dollars per annum.

4. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control three thousand sheep and less than three thousand five hundred constitute the fourth class and must pay One Hundred and fifty Dollars per annum.

5. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand five hundred sheep and less than three thousand constitute the fifth class and must pay One Hundred and twenty-five Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control two thousand sheep and less than two thousand five hundred constitute the sixth class and must pay One Hundred Dollars per annum.

7. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand five hundred sheep and less than two thousand constitute the seventh class and must pay Seventy-five Dollars per annum.

8. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control one thousand sheep and less than one thousand five hundred constitute the eighth class, and must pay Fifty Dollars per annum.

9. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control five hundred sheep and less than one thousand constitute the ninth class and must pay Twenty-five dollars per annum.

10. Those owning or having in their possession and under their control a less number than five hundred sheep constitute the tenth class, and must pay Twelve Dollars and fifty cents per annum.

SECTION 2. The license provided for by this ordinance shall be deemed a debt due the said County of Inyo, and the Tax-Collector of the said Inyo County shall have the collection of said license, and it is hereby made his duty to collect the same, and any person required to take out a license under the provisions of this ordinance, who fails or neglects, or refuses to take out such license, the said Tax Collector may direct suit to be brought in the name of the County of Inyo as plaintiff, for the recovery of said license and in such case either the Tax Collector or the attorney for the said plaintiff in said suit may make the necessary affidavit for, and a writ of attachment may issue without any bond being given on behalf of the plaintiff, and in case of recovery by the said plaintiff, fifty dollars damages must be added to the judgment and costs, to be collected from the defendant.

SECTION 3. The County Auditor of said Inyo County shall prepare and have printed, suitable blank licenses for the said Tax Collector to carry out the provisions of this ordinance, with a blank receipt attached, for the signature of the Tax-Collector, when sold.

SECTION 4. The said Tax Collector shall collector a fee of one dollar for each license sold which shall be paid into the Salary fund of the said Inyo County.

SECTION 5. All moneys collected for licenses under the provisions of this ordinance shall be paid over to the County Treasurer of said Inyo County as other moneys, and shall be placed to the credit of the Salary fund of said County.

SECTION 6. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after twenty-five days from its passage, and ordinance No. 41 of said Board of Supervisors passed on the 7th day of January, 1892, is hereby repealed, and all ordinances or parts of ordinances of said Board, in conflict herewith, are each and all of them hereby repealed.

SECTION 7. This ordinance shall be published with the names of the members of said Board of Supervisors voting for and against the same, in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper published in the said Inyo County, at least two weeks; said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said twenty-five days.

Andrew Bell is down from Big Pine.

Mrs. F. Rhine will arrive at Independence on next Wednesday's train.

Are you going to Big Pine next Thursday? You will have a good time if you do.

E. Robinson has gone to Los Angeles to look into the condition of the cattle market.

The Index evidently has no further use for Supervisor Uhlemeyer. His term of office expires this year.

Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Densmore arrived home on Wednesday from an extended visit to the Midwinter Fair.

Mrs. W. D. Roberts came down from Round Valley last week and is visiting with relatives at Camp Independence.

W. H. Mitchell, accompanied by his bride arrived at Independence last week, where they will make their future home.

A meeting of the directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association will be held at Independence on Monday evening next.

Mrs. J. J. Gunn has returned to Modock. She spent a couple of weeks visiting relatives and friends at Independence and vicinity.

The Board of Education will meet at Independence next Monday. It is expected that there will be several applicants for certificates.

Mrs. Roeper, mother of J. C. Roeper and Mrs. John Lubken, has been very ill for the past two weeks. Dr. I. J. Woodin has been in constant attendance.

The Directors of the Independence Track Association will hold a meeting in a few days to make arrangements for putting the track in suitable condition for the Fair races this fall.

Mrs. Thos. Mills arrived at Independence last week from Rogers' Station, near Mojave. She has been looking after real estate interests here and expects to return in a few days.

There has been another heavy fall of snow in the mountains during the week. The coming water season will be even better than last year, when the supply was exceptionally large.

A general reduction of freight rates has been made over the C. & C. R. R. Freight will now be delivered at all points in the Valley at an average rate of $2 per hundred, instead of $2.50 as formerly.

The case of Isley and Hughes was again brought up in the Superior Court yesterday. The prosecution having closed their case last week the defense began yesterday. It is likely that the case will be given to the jury to-morrow.

Mrs. M. E. Richardson, General Superintendent of the juvenile work of the I. O. G. T., will speak on the modern phase of temperance reform at the M. E. Church, Independence, on Monday and Tuesday evenings next. Everybody cordially invited, admission free.

On Wednesday evening a telegram from Citrus announced that D. Stubblefield had been taken seriously ill and requesting that a physician and P. H. Mack Esq. come to him immediately, at the residence of J. Willett. Dr. Louise L. Woodin and Mr. Mack went over at once and about 9 o'clock in the evening Dr. I. J. Woodin, who had just returned from Lone Pine, also arrived. Mr. Stubblefield was suffering the most intense pain in the abdomen. One paroxysm of pain would follow another until it would seem that he could not survive; but he possesses an iron constitution and great nerve and at last report was considered out of danger.

BIG PINE, February 14, 1894.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—The good people of this hamlet bid me send the following valentine to the capital of Inyo.

The purse of $150 for the fastest quarter horse is hung up for all Inyo horses; the track is in good trim. The grand ball in the evening of February 22d in honor of Truthful George will be one of the hamlet's choice efforts in the good time line. Baseball will also be a feature of the occasion. The Indians of the hamlet will play the natives of Bishop and the civilized pale-faces have arranged a match for a purse of $25. All who come will be insured a good time. SWAMPER.

A friend writing from Mojave under date of February 8th says: "Since seeing you I have been to Los Angeles and Pasadena and have got back this far in the mountains. I have taken in the new gold fields at and near Goler and like them very much. The Bonanza Gulch boys sold out for $6,000. Just what the new company intends to do with the property I do not know. Their purchase of the Bonanza property consisted of nine claims and now they are buying some others. Thomas Shaw and Martin Stander, both old Swansea smelters, are two of the five boys that sold out their interest in the Bonanza Gulch. They are now prospecting other claims which they have. It is said that the new company will put in a plant and bring water to wash the hills down, as the dry-washers leave about as much gold in the tailings as they take out, unless the gravel is in fine condition. There is quite a stampede to the new fields; from five to ten outfits can be seen going out nearly every day. The greatest excitement now seems to be at Summit, about fifteen miles east from Goler. A few days ago a nugget was picked up on one side of the hills at Red Rock which weighs $99. Also a piece of burnt lava and quartz which shows plenty of free gold. Many handsome specimens can be seen at Mr. Wilson's store; one that weighs $145. He buys much of the gold from the district and pays $17.25 per oz. for it; it brings him $17.50 per oz. in the City, if clean.

George Neill is doing a very good butcher business. Fin. Bedford is the village blacksmith; he has a good shop and dwelling, is doing a good business and is comfortable and happy. W. R. Johnson is working for Wilson, who is doing a very large business. This town now sports a new livery stable, with a town hall overhead. A new building is going up for a business of some kind and others are talked of, so that Mojave may become quite a town yet unless the dread fire visits it again and lays all in ashes.

The tramp element in at its height here; a few days ago I counted forty getting out of a freight car. It is nothing unusual to be struck half a dozen times a day for eating money.

The stage is running full; last trip there were seven passengers and left two, Ed. Ober and Charley Hilton.

Bill Withrow is tending bar here."

Long Slim Jim.

Respectfully inscribed to James McNally, Jim's Pard.

On the banks of Owens River
Stands a cabin, lone and bare,
A man once dwelt within it
Whose head was browed with care.
The thatch on his head and cabin roof
Was getting scarce and thin
He was known to friends along the stream
As Long Slim Jim.

Old Jim he played the violin
As it was played in days of old,
Old times would gather 'round him
As he sang the days of gold
A velvety touch he would place on the strings,
His foot on the floor kept time,
As he played and sang in tremulous tones,
"The days of Forty-nine."

Old Jim has gone and left them,
His weary mind is at rest;
Long years he carried a noble heart
Beneath a tattered vest.
He made few friends on the Golden Coast,
But they were true and true;
There's few that know where Jim came from,
None knows where he's gone to.

Old Jim he quietly passed away,
But one stood near his bier;
"I am an old time friend," he said
As he brushed away a tear;
"I run a saloon, am a gambler too,
So of course can have nothing to say.
I think God's churches, no preacher here?
Then I will kneel and pray."

Often when nights are still and calm
I pass that cabin door
I hear the tones of a violin,
A foot tapping the floor;
And as I stand and listen
To the notes of that violin,
Methinks Jim has death returned,
To play his own requiem.

Perhaps in future time his friends,
Though scattered far and few,
Will gather 'round his resting place,
And plant thereon a yew;
Whose trembling leaves will cast a shade
On the spot where lies Old Jim.
And a granite slab with the words engraved:
"Here lies Jim Peregrine."

Copp's Mining Code.—New Edition.

Henry N. Copp, the well known land lawyer of Washington, D. C., has issued a new edition of the American Mining Code, including laws lately passed by Congress and the several states and territories. All persons who intend to prospect for mines next Spring, can spend their winter evenings profitably in studying this book. It may be ordered by mail direct from the publisher if bookstores do not keep it in stock. The price is 50 cents. Copp's Mining Code embraces the U. S. Mining Laws and the official regulations, arranged by subjects, water rights, coal lands and timber cutting; saline lands and town sites; also the local state and territorial mining laws, with numerous practical forms, embracing location notices, proof of labor, notice of forfeiture, liens, surveys, application for patent, adverse claim, mining deed, escrow agreement and lease, with a valuable digest of court and department decisions.

Looking For Homes.

J. S. Eckles and N. H. Houser arrived at Independence yesterday from Covina, near Los Angeles. They are traveling in their own conveyance and drove the entire distance. The gentlemen have been interested in the Valley through articles published in the Los Angeles Herald and other papers. They represent a number of people in their locality who desire to secure homes in a new country, and if a satisfactory report is made will come here. Messrs. Eckles and Houser will spend a couple of weeks here looking over the Valley thoroughly. Mr. Eckles has had considerable experience in colonizing and is a practical surveyor. He owns an orange orchard at Covina, and before leaving he picked some beautiful specimens of navel oranges and brought with him.

A Bold Robber.

The V. & T. express car was robbed by a lone robber last Friday night. The train was on its way to Reno and had not gone half a mile from Carson, when the front door of the express car was broken open, and a robber with a gun in his hand demanded paymaster Mills' tin box. It was given him, and he jumped off the train and has not been seen since. The night was a very stormy one. Mr. Mills was taking the money to Reno to pay off railroad hands. It is said the robber got away with $3,400.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

A. O. Collins returned from a trip to Kern county last Thursday. He was accompanied by C. H. Persons of Los Angeles and Messrs. More and Childs of Kansas. The latter gentlemen spent several days looking over the Valley with a view to investment and returned to Los Angeles yesterday. They expressed themselves as being highly pleased with the County and will return at an early date.

EXERCISE.

One reason for the fact that the general health of the community is growing better ever year is that more people take regular exercise. Exercise, however, has its difficulties. If indulged in a little too long, or so violently as to make one liable to take cold, it results in stiffness and soreness of the muscles and joints.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are invaluable in such cases. Placed on the back, the chest, on the limbs, they afford instant relief and leave the muscles free from all soreness. Some athletes cut them into strips and apply them to parts of the limbs where they could not put a whole PLASTER and find that they are a great relief and assistance.

MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP FOR CHILDREN TEETHING For sale by all Druggists. 25 Cents a bottle.

She Was an Angel.

"So you were out shopping, eh?" gasped Mr. Newwed at dinner last evening, in the cozy new home in Columbus avenue.

"Yes, dear, and I want to tell you all about it."

"I—I gave you fifty dollars, I believe," he murmured, swallowing a double allowance of cafe noir.

"You did, Charlie, and that's just it. I started for the shopping district at 3 o'clock, and have been trotting up and down ever since. You have no idea how much we women have to contend with."

"Humph! Tell me about the bargains."

"There was a half rate sale in one place; the loveliest goods you ever saw. So cheap too. Then there was a 'knock out' counter in another store, where they were fairly giving things away. I never saw such bargains! Then there was a 'fire-and-water' sale across the way, and the way things went was astounding. Then there was a 'clearing out' sale in the next block. And a 'bankrupt' sale near by. And a 'marked down list' only a block away. And a 'half off' sale over on"——

"Great jumping Cæsar's ghost!"

"Yes, and I attended them all. Oh, such astonishing bargains!"

"And I suppose that now I'll have to announce a 'half rate' sale on my personal effects, and a 'knock out' sale on my salary, and a 'closing out' sale on my bankbook, and a 'cast off' sale with my uncle, and a 'gone-to-grass' sale on the kitchen fixtures—just to equalize the pressure, eh?"

"Charlie, you ungrateful wretch! I was about to say that I consider myself a jewel. After all the careful teachings of mamma, just as if I couldn't save your money, and"——

"Well, they all say that."

"I—I didn't buy a thing. Here's your fifty dollar bill!"

"What's that?"

"That's what I said."

"My angel!" he gasped, dropping his fork, "forgive me, I have wronged you!"

"I didn't use your money; but I ordered a wagon load of nice things and had them charged. So there!"—New York Recorder.

Afloat in a "Coffin Ship."

Coffin ships? Yes, I know them, and there are plenty of 'em about still—though, mind you, they are nothing to what they used to be. You should have seen the ships they used to have in the old Quebec trade. They actually passed chain cables around them to hold them together. Yes, it's a fact. They were tied together with chain cables, shored up and wedges driven in to prevent 'em going to pieces. I remember sailing in one. She had been a steamer thirty-nine years and then converted to a sailing ship; but where the boilers and other fixings had been you could take a shovel and dig out the rotten wood by the foot. Dry rot? Why, we were getting the boats fixed up and bread bags waterproofed all ready for foundering weeks before we started. The crew walked out of her, and the captain says to me, "I suppose you'll go too." I said, "No; if you are going to stop I shall." So we got some more men and sailed.

A few days later it came on to blow and she broke in half. She didn't go to pieces, but lay all humped up in the middle, and the sea took possession of her. We threw the deckload—deals they were—overboard, and got the masts out of her, and there she lay full of water. She didn't sink, being a wooden ship, but her stern came off and the deals were popping out of her. We stopped like that ten days; couldn't enter the cabins, and then it came on to blow tremendous, so we got the longboat ready for a start. The four men got in her and we were just going to follow, when one of 'em pulls out an ax that was in the boat's bows and cuts the painter, and away they goes. Well, I don't think I ever shall go to heaven after the cursing I did then. But they were all drowned and we were saved—got taken off four days afterward. —Cor. St. James' Budget.

No Wonder Indians Are Dying Out.

The conversation had drifted to Indians, and apropos of the topic a lumberman in the office remarked that at the camp on Prairie river, from which he had just returned, he had seen a goodly group of these noble aborigines camped near the lumber shanties. "They came to look after a horse," said he. "Lost a horse?" "No, we lost one; got killed, and they came down to cut him up." "What for?" "Why, to eat him. They staid right by the carcass and hung up and dried every pound of meat on him. Queer how they found it out. The horse hadn't been dead twenty-four hours before the whole tribe were after him; crows couldn't have done better."

"That's nothing," said an old logger standing by. "One winter six horses died in our camp of epizootic, and I'll be hanged if they didn't pick the bones of every one of them clean. There is no trouble in accounting for the rapid reduction of the Indian population when you know what they eat."—Minneapolis Lumberman.

Mushrooms Easily Grown.

Any one may raise mushrooms in his cellar or even in his attic with very satisfactory results.

He should have a bed which may consist of a shallow box, and this should be filled with a dark, rich loam to the depth of, say, eight inches. It should be in a dark place, and a damp place also is beneficial, but if he uses an attic the room may be kept dark by heavy curtains and the earth damp by frequent watering. An average temperature of from 60 to 70 degs. should be maintained. Almost all seedsmen sell the spawn bricks, and when the bed is prepared the spawn should be broken into fine surface particles and just covered with the earth.

Notwithstanding the popular belief, mushrooms do not come up in a night, but they do in four or five nights, and when once up their growth is very rapid. —New York Telegram.

Left Handed People in Prehistoric Times.

Professor Mortillet, from observations upon flint scrapers found in various parts of France, has been led to believe that the proportion of left handed persons was much greater in prehistoric times than at present in the same locality. Out of 354 neolithic scrapers which he examined he determines that 105 were used by the right hand and 197 by the left; the remaining 52 were not marked so clearly that it could be determined by which hand they were used, or they may have been used by either indifferently.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A gentleman who lives in Mount Vernon, Ga., is said to have a veritable curiosity in the vegetable line. It is a cabbage, or collard, that in going to seed just literally spread itself. As the seed stalk grew upward, it flattened itself out like a fan, until it became ten inches wide and about half an inch thick, the top being ornamented with a fringe composed of thousands of bloom buds.—Philadelphia Ledger.

CHAPTER I.

"Mary, will you give me a kiss?"

Some years ago I occupied the set of chambers in the Temple, London, that are generally associated with the names of Pendennis and George Warrington. Four windows look out upon the garden court, the fountain and the Middle Temple hall. The rooms are among the pleasantest in London. A Mr. James Burnett (a stranger to me) lives in the apartment ascribed to George Warrington; the remaining five rooms of the set accommodated two friends of mine—Edward Bold, a barrister in fair practice, and his younger brother, a student at Charing Cross hospital, one of the brightest, cheeriest lads I ever knew. We had a small kitchen in common and were ministered unto by a couple of venerable ladies—Mrs. Swatman, a globular spinster of about 60, and her associate and assistant, a widow of mysterious age.

These two excellent personages were a source of vast entertainment to us. Mrs. Swatman would announce, with the greatest gravity, "We want some new shirts," or "We shall need a new great coat this winter," or "Don't you think we'd better get in some coals?" Speaking of Edward Bold, she once said to me: "We've been together seven years now!" I am afraid that Mrs. Swatman regarded me with mild contempt. She had "done for" barristers all her life and was possessed with the notion that other men were for the most part suspicious characters. Her misgivings regarding me were somewhat allayed by the discovery that I wrote for one or two newspapers and magazines; many of "the gentlemen," as she phrased it, being engaged in similar pursuits. She was at all events a faithful, industrious and admirable old creature, and, compared with the average Temple laundress, a jewel among washerwomen.

Her worthy "book" was a fearful and wonderful sight. The handwriting required as much and as serious study as would have qualified me to decipher cuneiform inscriptions with ease; and the theory of orthography affected by the scribe was—whatever else might be said of it—delightfully straightforward and unsophisticated. "Kollurd hed," "stak," "shuger," "corfy," are examples that occur to me of an achievement in this direction; and there was also a mysterious item which cropped up every now and then under the name of "faggits." Regarding this last curiosity and a proper sense of economy conspired at length to make me request an explanation. "Mrs. Swatman," I said, "how is it I burn so much wood? I see half a crown constantly for faggots; surely there must be some mistake!"

"Lor bless you, sir," was her reply, with an indulgent chuckle at my opacity, "that ain't faggots, it's 'forgets!'"

Mrs. Swatman's assistant was a queer, undersized, shriveled old person who looked as though she had been mummified in the time of the Pharaohs, and by magic arts had been brought back to life. Whether or not this were a true account of her origin she was at any rate that most inestimable of treasures a willing servant. No amount of trouble ever moved her to complain; on the most tempestuous days she would trot out on errands without a murmur, and she would fetch the most extravagant quantities of bath water as spontaneously as if it had been so much beer for her own consumption. You are not to infer from this comparison that she was addicted to the beverage referred to; both she and Mrs. Swatman were thoroughly sober, respectable old bodies. For my part I soon became their sworn admirer, and this long before I had any suspicion how important a part one of them was to play in the little drama of my life.

One afternoon Eward Bold came into my room to ask whether I cared to go to some private theatricals. Now I hold private theatricals to be little better than public nuisances; nevertheless, after duly considering two possible contingent advantages of the enterprise, I decided that go I would; and in the course of a day or two I received a card from "Lady Barracoot at home Thursday, June 19th;" and when the Thursday in question came around I presented myself at Lancaster Gate.

The performance was to consist of an opening farce—its name has escaped my memory—and Mr. Arthur Sketchley's comedy, "How Will They Get Out of It?" and that I shall never foget. The farce bored me; the actors were imperfect, and in looking forward to the comedy which was to succeed I rapidly came to the conclusion that it would be anything but a success and that "they" never would "get out of it." But there is an end to all things, even to a farce played by amateurs, and after some tiresome delay, which an exhibition of pyrotechnic pianoforte playing rendered still more intolerable, the curtain rose on the comedy.

I was familiar with the piece, and remembered too well the original cast—Charles Matthews and his wife, Mrs. Stirling, Frank Matthews and his wife, Montafre and Miss Wentworth. Indeed I had been present at the rehearsal when the piece was originally produced at the St. James' theatre in 1864, and I knew every bit of "business" by heart; so that my forebodings on the present occasion were gloomy, and they were in a large measure justified. The piece was for the most part indifferently played; but one assumption was, as a well known dramatic critic would say, "adequate." The part of Jerry Arnton, originally taken by Miss Wentworth, was brightly and intelligently rendered by a young and pretty girl whose name, the bill informed me, was Mary Bruce. A fair Scotch lassie she was, with a mass of auburn hair shot with gold; a broad fair brow, giving promise of good sense; dark eyebrows and eyelashes and serene blue eyes through which looked forth the soul of a frank and fearless maiden. The nose was small and straight, the upper lip short and sensitive; the complexion bright, and the whole woman wholesome, lightsome and delightful. She seemed to me, in fact, the perfection of all that is feminine; and I made up my mind that when the performance was over I would get an introduction to her, and I lost no time, accordingly, in asking Edward Bold whether he would act as my sponsor.

"Delighted, my dear fellow," was his reply. "I've known her ever since she was so high, and she's as good as the gold in her hair. And, by the by," he added as he took my arm to lead me to her, "her father is Campbell Bruce, the Q. C., a widower with two children; his chambers, you know, are on our staircase, first floor."

The necessary formalities were then gone through with, and in the course of the evening I had several opportunities of talking to Miss Bruce, and I succeeded (much to the disgust of several ineffective young whippersnappers) in taking her down to supper. It turned out that her brother, who was in the navy, had once stopped a few days with me on my station in New Zealand, for I had been the victim of a disastrous speculation in sheep in that colony and had succumbed, with hundreds of other unfortunates, to the hard times which commenced in 1868 and culminated in 1870. I may remark in this connection (though I said nothing about it to Miss Bruce) that with the exception of a life interest in a sum of £5,000 I had lost every farthing I had in the world. Later in the evening I was presented to Mr. Bruce, a massive, stern looking man of perhaps 52. He had a judicial air with him, which gave one the impression that his life had been passed in weighing evidence and finding it wanting. But when he found that Bold and I were old friends, and that his son had been my guest at Ruatanuiha, he was good enough to ask me to call on him in Inverness terrace.

"Come some Sunday afternoon," he said. "We are always at home then, and I shall be glad to have some conversation with the man who was hospitable to my boy Carnegie in New Zealand."

I need not say that I felt sincerely grateful to Carnegie Bruce for having smoked my tobacco and drunk my whisky in the Antipodes. I accepted Mr. Bruce's invitation, and a few Sundays afterward I went to Inverness terrace. The afternoon passed away rapidly and I was requested to stay to dinner. You will not be surprised to hear that I did so. The fact is that (as Bold had been thoughtful enough to tell me beforehand) Mr. Bruce had a foible. He had for years been endeavoring to establish his claim to the dormant peerage of Dunedin; and once he was mounted upon that hobby it galloped away with him. I was so successful in my encouragement of his amiable weakness that he took quite a fancy to me, and was pleased to declare that I was a man of sound sense, and that it was a pity I had not studied for the bar. After dinner we reorganized the navy, reconstituted the ministry, settled the French question, placed the army on a proper footing and solved the Irish land problem, all in the space of five-and-forty minutes, the quickest time on record. And then I cordially acceded to Mr. Bruce's suggestion that we should join Miss Bruce in the drawing room. The worthy gentleman retired with all reasonable expedition into a corner to read a book, and I was left to make myself acceptable to Miss Mary.

I flatter myself that few men are greater experts than I at the twin arts of being agreeable or disagreeable. I soon discovered that my lovely hostess was by no means devoid of a certain spice of humor. In truth she was overflowing with spirits and gayety, and I left the house that night as far gone in love as a man may be. On my walk to chambers I made up my mind that Miss Bruce was a girl who, under any circumstances, could be depended upon to "run straight;" that her past was an unsullied page; that she was as innocent as she was pretty, and as clever as she was innocent, all of which I take to be as great a rarity among the girls of today as a black pearl in a Whitstable native or a red Indian in a blue frock.

Of course I had determined long before I ever heard of Mary Bruce that under no circumstances would I allow myself the luxury of falling in love. But love unfortunately is like measles; it comes and it goes and there is no help for it. Accordingly I fell madly in love with Mary Bruce. We met at parties. I dined occasionally at Inverness terrace, and at last one day at a water party I came to grief; all my stern resolutions vanished and I proposed.

We had gone by the Z. W. L. to Henley, a party of eight. There were Miss Bruce and her aunt—a married sister of Mr. Bruce—two daughters, the two Bolds and myself. We had arranged to lunch at the Red Lion, Henley, thence to row leisurely to Marlow, dine at the Complete Angler and go home by the last train. It was a baking July day, tropically hot, but bright and glorious, reminding me of Honolulu or Levaka more than of muggy England! After lunch we paddled gently down through Hambledon Lock to Medenham, by which time the Bolds had developed strange if not original views as to shandygaff. We strolled about the abbey and made much fun of its bogus character; had a game of romps with the pretty children of mine host of the Terry Hotel, and then rowed on to Harley Lock, which was then in a disgraceful state of disrepair. The Bolds went off to pay a flying visit to some friends of theirs who lived at the Mill house, close to the lock. While the water was running off, Mary Bruce, who was in charge of the hitcher aft, allowed the boat to come too close to the sill, and suddenly the stern was lodged on the top of a broken pile.

WHEN WAR IS DECLARED

Against a man's happiness by his stomach, the enemy may be pacified and brought speedily and easily to terms. That potent regulator of digestion, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, disciplines the rebellious organ thoroughly. Indigestion arises from weakness of the stomach, and the food in it, for want of the power to digest, decomposes and acidifies, giving rise to heartburn, flatulence and pain, besides a multitude of symptoms both changeful and perplexing. But peace soon reigns when the great stomachic is resorted to and used with persistence. Dyspepsia gives rise to morbid discomposure of mind, and even sleeplessness and hypochondria in chronic cases. To the complete dismissal of these the Bitters is fully adequate. Liver complaint, constipation, debility, rheumatism and malaria are completely subdued by this genial medicine.

"German Syrup"

My acquaintance with Boschee's German Syrup was made about fourteen years ago. I contracted a cold which resulted in a hoarseness and cough which disabled me from filling my pulpit for a number of Sabbaths. After trying a physician, without obtaining relief I saw the advertisement of your remedy and obtained a bottle. I received quick and permanent help. I never hesitate to tell my experience. Rev. W. From Catarrh It is But a Step To Consumption

And thousands of people are unconsciously taking the fatal step. If you have Catarrh in the Head do not allow it to progress unheeded and unchecked. It is a disease of the system and not simply of the nose and throat. The blood reaches every part of the system. Therefore the only way to cure Catarrh is to take a thorough blood purifier like Hood's Sarsaparilla, which perfectly and permanently cures Catarrh.

Not? If Not, Why Not?

The Gas and Gasoline Engine is rapidly taking the place of all other small power, and having noticed many inferior machines on the market, poorly constructed, we have been prompted to make a machine of superior merit and workmanship, and do away with all of their objectionable features.

We are constructing these engines of the best material, and using wrought-iron and steel liberally, and not throwing them together, which is the case with a great many other manufacturers of gas engines. Our aim being to excel all others in workmanship.

HERCULES ENGINES

GAS ENGINES — GASOLINE ENGINES

For Simplicity They are The Best!

Can be run on natural or illuminating gas.

Workmanship the best.

ALWAYS ready, and a boy can start them.

They oil from feed-cups, and are almost altogether automatic in this regard.

Have fewer parts, therefore are less likely to get out of order than any other engine now built.

Our Marine Engines are double cylinder, very compact, with the weight below the water line, and are light but substantially built.

Our Gas Engines consume about twenty cubic feet of gas per horse-power per hour. Our Gasoline Engines consume about one-eighth of a gallon of gasoline per hour per horse-power. Our igniting tubes are very inexpensive, and far more reliable than the electric spark.

All Engines fitted with governor attachment, which regulates the supply of gas, according to power used.

No batteries or electric spark to care for.

The full actual horse power of every engine is guaranteed.

Easily shut down and started when power is required.

Expense does not start until you commence to run the engine.

No trouble with soot.

They run with a cheaper grade of gasoline than other engines.

THE BELLS BENEATH THE SEA.

The sea is calm, the wind is fair,
Nor ever a cloud doth lower—
The good ship speeds with the blessed bells
She bears to Boltreaux tower.
The pilot crossed his breast, and cried:
"Thank God! the harbor's near,
For vesper bells at Tintagel
Ring out their music clear.

"Aye, thank the Lord for our good speed
Across the doubtful sea!"
"Fool!" sneered the captain, "thank thyself:
God holds no helm for thee."
The pilot crossed his breast, and cried,
"God pardon thee once more,
And grant that we may safely come
Unto the Cornish shore."

The captain's oath was on his lips,
Or ever the sun went down,
And while the people thronged the cliffs
Above the harbor town,
A mighty wave swept o'er the sea,
With dull and sullen roar;
The good ship trembled all her length
As she sank to rise no more.

Then o'er the whelming waters pealed
(As tolling funeral knells
For those lost souls) the soft, sweet chimes
Of the Forrabury bells.

* * * * * * *

The moss creeps over Boltreaux church,
Where rings no vesper lay;
Still waits the tower its blessed bells,
And silent stands today.
For low beneath the Cornish wave,
Where tangled wrecks lie deep,
The Forrabury bells are hid
And their sweet echoes keep.
But ever 'gainst the billows toss,
And storm winds shriek in glee;
Their muffled chimes the blessed bells
Still ring beneath the sea.

FOURTEEN MILES OF FEAR.

A Ride Back End Foremost Over a Strange Railroad Track by Night.

"Funny, isn't it, what daredevil acts railroad men will often do?" asked a little traveling man of a few friends as he dropped into one of the Grand Pacific rotunda chairs.

"Yes, something like trying to run two trains on the same track or trying to see whether the rails or a man's leg is the hardest," suggested a fellow drummer.

"No, I mean in the ordinary course of business. The other day I started for Washington and I had a premonition that the trip was not to be of the best, for on the way to the depot I purchased a pocket comb of a street vender, who gave me a quarter too much change. We got as far as Auburn Junction and it was awful dark, when the station agent informed us that there was a wreck between us and Defiance. Later he said there were two wrecks and that three men had been killed. The debris was piled so high upon the tracks that it would take the wreckers hours to clear them. I saw our conductor and engineer in close conversation.

"Suddenly the conductor said, 'Bill, there is nothing left us but to run around on the Wabash tracks to Defiance.'

"'But the Wabash has no operator here to give us orders,' answered the engineer.

"'Oh, I'll cut you off and we'll turn the engine around at the roundhouse table and make our way over the fourteen miles of strange track. As long as your headlight shows up you can creep over the road, can't you?'

"The knight of the throttle was a careful man, but he knew that the United States mail was being delayed and a couple of hundred passengers were angrily demanding that the trainmen do something to hurry them on. 'I'll go you,' he said, and the engine went down to the turntable to turn around. Upon coming back it was discovered that it would be impossible to couple her to the hind end of our train, as the sleeper draft irons were of a different pattern and higher than the coupler of the engine. Another pause for deliberation.

"Finally the conductor advised the engineer to go back, turn around and couple on in the original position. 'We'll just cross over on the spur and back up the fourteen miles.' And we did. That stretch of fourteen miles on a night as dark as pitch, over an unknown road, without a headlight and with 200 passengers unaware of the risk the trainmen were running to accommodate them and—well, I tell you it was exciting. No orders, no nothing, as you might say.

"I stood on the hind end, which was then the fore end, with the conductor and four brakemen, as we slowly dragged our way through the darkness. The flagmen carried red lanterns and torpedoes to run ahead and flag should a train be heard approaching, but it was dollars to butternuts that had a headlight appeared around one of those unknown curves no one of our train could have reached the approaching train in time to prevent her from crashing into our train. I've done a little railroading in my time and have taken a train over some risky places, but that fourteen miles of backing up without orders, without a headlight to aid our progress and on a strange track, is about the most squeamish ride I ever traveled. That shows you how many risks a railroad man will take to please the travelers."—Chicago News.

A Charming Little Pet.

A charming little foreign pet for the house is the suricate. This pretty creature, which, if we remember rightly, was among the number of Frank Buckland's animal companions, is an active and vivacious little fellow, some ten inches long, with greenish brown fur, large bright eyes, a short pointed nose and dainty paws, which, like the squirrel's or raccoon's, are used as hands, to hold, to handle and to ask for more. Eloquent in supplication, tenacious in retention, the suricate's paws are expressive, plaintive and wholly irresistible. The creature is made for a pet, and is so affectionate to its master that it can undergo any degree of "spoiling" without injury to its temper.—London Spectator.

Why the Grumbler Is Entertaining.

No one offers the systematic grumbler the tax of sympathy. He does not want it, moreover. His woes and grievances are his stock in trade. It is an understood thing that without them he would be a very dull fellow. As it is they save his reputation, and set the ball of small talk moving—no matter in what direction.—All the Year Round.

SAVED BY OIL.

Stuff That has Kept Many a Ship From Going to the Bottom.

CALMING HEAVY AND VIOLENT SEAS.

Nearly Every Vessel Carries Barrels of Whale Oil.—Tales From Shippers' Log Books.

"Throwing oil on the troubled waters" is now conceded by mariners to be a most practicable and efficacious method of lessening the chances of shipwreck and rendering heavy and violent seas smooth and calm. The confidence in the use of oil during storms at sea has increased to such an extent among sea captains that nowadays hardly a vessel leaves port which has not aboard a large supply of whale oil—this kind being found to be the best and cheapest.

It is not very long ago that many hardy sons of Neptune ridiculed the idea of using oil at sea, and there were some among that large body of unbelievers who actually laughed long and heartily when the matter was broached. The idea of a few quarts of oil quieting a turbulent sea was regarded as a huge joke by them. Within recent years, however, these worthies have changed their tune entirely and have had good reason for doing so. Since the experiment has been successfully tried by many mariners hundreds of vessels have been saved by a timely use of oil.

Their captains reported that the oil was found to quiet the violent seas in the immediate vicinity of the vessel and to keep the big waves from breaking on deck and swamping the cabins. There are many cases on record where the result of using oil was so gratifying and satisfactory that the captains of the vessels in question deemed the matter of importance enough to warrant a special reference in their log books.

Some of these reports are interesting and have never been published. The following reports, obtained recently from masters of American vessels who have used oil in heavy weather at sea, are typical of many others received from shippers of every nationality.

"After the whale oil gave out we collected a lot of paint oil, kerosene and varnish mixed with paint oil, and allowed this to drop over the side. I am perfectly satisfied," said the captain, "that the oil saved the ship, and I desire this statement to be given publicity and prominence. I make it a practice now to carry a supply of whale oil. This kind I regard as the best, and to keep it thin in cold weather I add a small quantity of turpentine."

The American schooner Charles L. Mitchell, Captain Frost, during a gale off Hatteras, heavy seas breaking over the vessel fore and aft, hove to under close reefed fore and mainsails, rigged a block to the end of the flying jibboom and ran out a gunny sack filled with oakum saturated with fish oil, which dripped into the water. After this the heavy seas approached within a few feet of the vessel and then combed under the oil film without breaking on board. Twice the vessel plunged her flying jibboom into very heavy seas, but shipped no water.

American ship Granite State, Captain Barstow, voyage from Hiogo to New York: A sea came over the stern and knocked away the wheel and steering gear, breaking the wheel stanchion and the windows in after end of house and flooded the cabin.

The ship came broadside to the wind and shipped heavy seas, which did considerable damage. In this plight the vessel threatened to go down. Poured quantities of oil over bows and down the closets and hung out gunny bags filled with oil. The effect was instantaneous. The waves rolled as high as before, but did not break on deck. The captain managed to get vessel off before the wind and then steered with tackles until the steering gear was repaired.

The American schooner Governor Ames, Captain Davis, was also saved during a storm by use of oil. During the voyage from Puget sound to San Francisco, while in the Straits of Fuca, the schooner was struck by a terrific gale. One of the port and two of the starboard bow ports were stove in and the cutwater and part of the bowsprit carried away. When the vessel was threatened with destruction oil was thrown on the waves until the vessel was surrounded by a thick film. Instantly the seas became smooth and the waves no longer broke on the deck. McCallum bay was made in safety.

The American steamship Shawmut, Captain Fuller, report reads: "I have used fish oil in every heavy storm encountered during the last eighteen months, and always carry a barrel for that purpose. I have always found that the spreading oil prevents the heavy seas from breaking on board, and during this entire period only one sea has boarded the ship. The usual method of using oil is to put oakum into the forward closet bowls and fill them with oil. Once off Hatteras a man was lost overboard, but we had no difficulty in lowering a lifeboat, although the sea was running very high and breaking."

The American schooner Rigal, Captain Dixon, reports: "In September, 1889, while fishing between Banquereau and St. Peter's bank, in twenty fathoms, a very heavy gale sprung up, with tremendous sea. Sent out boats to save the buoys and lines, leaving the captain, one man and the cook on board the vessel. The boats were occasionally lost to sight in the heavy combers, and thinking that all would perish, got the vessel under way and went to windward of the trawls and boats. Stood up and down to windward, and poured about half a barrel of blubber oil overboard. The heavy slick thus produced drifted down to the men who were trying to save their lines and trawls, and the crew succeeded without much difficulty in saving everything, as well as in making a fine haul of fish. Without such use of oil the buoys, lines and trawls would have been lost, and the chances for the crew and boats very slim."

As a rule sea captains do not like to confess that the use of oil in heavy weather was the means of bringing their vessels out of a "tight corner." It is a reflection on their ability as sea captain they think. There are still some hardened old sons of Neptune who would not deign to use oil in heavy weather. But the fact remains that oil has saved property and lives when seamanship was powerless to do so.—New York Advertiser.

An old student, proud in the possession of a baby, brought it to Newnham to be admired. The child was received with huge delight by the "blue stockings;" indeed, there was such an ebullition of baby worship that the poor little infant was in danger of being suffocated by the vigor with which it was snatched from one pair of arms by another. The mother was obliged to intervene, and consented to allow each student three minutes in which to revel in sole possession of her child.—Ladies' Home Journal.

A Difficult Task.

In the mayor's office at the city hall there is a large safe used for storing public documents. The safe is set into the wall and was placed there when the structure was built. Inside is a steel burglar proof chest, having a four bolt Yale combination lock. The safe also has a combination lock. After the death of Mayor Doyle, in 1886, the little chest was found to be securely locked and nobody had the combination. It then developed that Mayor Doyle was the only person who knew the numbers by which the chest could be opened, and accordingly it remained securely fastened, nobody having any idea of the contents. The chest was unopened through the terms of Mayor Doyle's successors until yesterday.

When Mayor Potter took charge of affairs he learned the history of the steel chest, and a short time ago read the account of how Herbert S. Page fathomed the mysteries of the most intricate safe locks with ease. A combination of natural curiosity and desire to know whether or not any public documents were in the steel compartment induced the mayor to forward a communication to Mr. Page requesting him to come to this city, and if possible open the little safe. Mr. Page arrived and in the presence of a number of city officials commenced the work. He found the lock a most intricate one, being capable of 100,000,000 changes. He labored forty minutes, and at the end of the time the bolts swung back and the door opened. There was nothing in the chest.

After opening the door Mr. Page studied out the combination and discovered that the combination, which it was believed had died with Mayor Doyle, was 70-50-4-56. The lock was designed especially to prevent opening by sense of touch, and Mr. Page was highly complimented for his skillful work.—Providence Journal.

Jimmy Had Been Dozing.

There is a certain faithful retainer, whom I will call Jimmy for short, who has been in the employ of either Lester Wallack or Theodore Moss since the days when Jennie Hughes first played in the "French Spy" and led society in Bond street. In the old days Jimmy's duties were many and varied, and one of them was to station himself on first nights at the rear of the first balcony in the center of a galaxy of billposters and other lithographic guests of the management, and at a suitable moment to lead a spontaneous call for Mr. Wallack. Jimmy is now a bright, fresh faced lad of fifty-seven, and is still in the employ of Mr. Moss.

The other evening during a performance he was peacefully dozing in the balcony, when a loud burst of applause brought him suddenly to his feet, and he startled the house with a loud call of "Wallack! Wallack! Wallack!" It was not until he had been cast into outer darkness that he awoke to the fact that it was not the first night of "The Shaughraun" that he was "assisting at," but the seventieth of "For Money" in the year of grace 1892.—New York Truth.

A Daring Sneak Thief.

Residents of Hyde Park can now sit down to their tables and enjoy their dinners without having the pleasure of the meal marred by the fear that a "climber" was probably pillaging the upper stories of their home. The Hyde Park police have captured Bruno Pruhn, a daring sneak thief and porch climber. To him are attributed by the police the numerous robberies which have occurred in Hyde Park during the last few months.

Pruhn always uses the same tactics in entering a house. He selects a residence which stands next to an unfinished building and enters it on one of the upper stories from one of the windows or the roof of the new structure while the family is on the first floor or basement at dinner. Pruhn selected Hyde Park as a base of operations because much building is going on, and he could easily find a house to suit his plans.—Chicago News.

A Telephone Marvel.

An interesting and amusing instance of the efficacy of the London-Paris telephone occurred the other day which is worth recording. The Salvation Army band were marching from the Royal exchange playing the "Marseillaise," when an idea struck the men present in the telephone room. The windows and doors were thrown open, and the attendant at the Paris end was asked if he could hear anything. The response (in French) was immediate, "Yes, I can hear a band playing the 'Marseillaise.'" That a band of music playing in the streets of London could be plainly distinguished in Paris is, we think, a sufficiently striking marvel of the Nineteenth century science.—London Electrical Engineer.

Secrets Offered for Sale.

The center of the French ribbon trade, St. Etienne, has been shaken with excitement on the rumor of the betrayal of valuable trade secrets to foreign firms. A large merchant received a letter from England saying that a workman at St. Etienne had offered to sell all the novelties for the coming season, and agreed to go wherever required to set up looms. Investigation showed that a commission agent was the guilty party.—Paris Letter.

A Change Indeed.

The transition from a profound searching of the heavens for new comets, asteroids and remote fixed stars to a rapid transit down a rope to escape being roasted is both violent and undignified, and yet Professor Copeland, the royal astronomer at Edinburgh, made it when his house caught fire the other night.

Restoring a Waterproof.

The following process is said to restore to a waterproof the original softness: Dissolve a teaspoonful of best gray lime in half a pailful of water; wipe the cloak well with a soft cloth, wrung loosely out of this mixture; hang to dry and repeat the operation in two hours.—New York Journal

ACTORS' HOODOOS.

Woe to a Play Whose First Night Sees a Yellow Flageolet.

FAILURE IS SURE TO FOLLOW.

Italian Ballet Girls Who Carry Pieces of Cheese for Good Luck.—Queer Superstitions.

"That play can never succeed," said an old time manager in an up town cafe several nights ago. "It is a pity, too, for it's a good play and a good company. I wish that I had not seen the dress rehearsal."

"You're getting old, colonel, and you only see success in the past," said a leading man.

"That is where you are wrong," replied the manager. "I know a good thing when I see it, and this play is a good thing, but it began with a hoodoo, and it will surely fail."

"Hoodoos are tommyrot! There is no such thing as a hoodoo that can harm any play."

Around the table were half a dozen actors and men interested in theatrical affairs. Few men in New York know more about the history of the American stage for the past few years than the manager who spoke. Booth, Jefferson, Barrett and Irving have all claimed him as their friend, and his reminiscences of the stage make him the center figure in any after t. play gathering of actors.

"Now, colonel," said the leading man when the glasses had been filled, "you were talking about hoodoos on the stage. I don't believe in them. When a play is a failure, it is easy to explain it by saying it had a hoodoo."

"Well," said the colonel, "actors the world over are a superstitious lot. Even Henry Irving brought his horseshoe to this country when he first came here. I didn't believe in hoodoos and that sort of thing when I was young. I don't like to accept them now, but I am forced to by experience.

"Have you ever known the yellow flageolet to fail in wrecking a play? Now, you laugh at that. I think that, as a rule, there is no harm in a yellow flageolet in itself, but there is a peculiar fatality in the circumstances that bring it into a theater orchestra at a dress rehearsal or on an opening night. There was a yellow flageolet in the orchestra today, and that is why I say that the piece is doomed. Yes, that's right; laugh if you will, but my experience is a long one, and I think I am a sane man. Any old manager in this country will tell you that a yellow flageolet is sure to wreck any company. Circus men won't have them in their bands. I could tell you many incidents to illustrate what I say. Perhaps you remember that when 'The Junior Partner' was put on, every one said it was going to be a big success. Everything pointed that way, but it opened with a yellow flageolet in the orchestra, and then Mrs. McKee Rankin's troubles began. That is a fact. I have known stage managers, and sensible men, too, who would refuse to ring up the curtain until the yellow flageolet was driven out of the orchestra."

"That is just as absurd," said the light comedy man, "as the cheese that the Italian ballet girls in the 'Crystal Slipper' kept in their dressing rooms. I know the effect of that mascot, for I was in the company. Every time I went on the stage or near the dressing rooms I thought of Hunter's Point and the gashouse district. Couldn't persuade those girls to throw away this cheese. They believed that as long as they kept it they would be sure of an engagement. The cheese had been given to them in Italy to protect them from harm. Each girl had a small piece of it—loud cheese it was, too—rolled up in paper in her trunk. To be sure of protection they took it to their dressing rooms. Eddie Foy nearly choked because of the smell of that cheese. Eddie never did like comic opera, and that cheese settled him. 'I could only show them what I could do in Daly's company,' he would say, 'and escape from this horrible Italian cheese. I'm too delicate for this work any way. Just wait until I get into the "legit" and wear swallow tails and smoke cigarettes on the stage and pull my cuffs.' Now, colonel, speaking about the hoodoos, that is my experience with a mascot."

"For some reason," said the leading man, "actors are naturally superstitious. Perhaps it is because their life is one of many ventures, and sometimes the most insignificant thing may lead to failure or success. Probably a good deal of the superstition is assumed. Most people have a dash of that in them, whether they will admit it or not. Do you remember when Rose Coghlan made her hit at Wallack's in 'Diplomacy' as the Countess Zicka? As you remember, the plot of this play hangs on the perfume that the countess uses. Rose Coghlan used a certain perfume on that night, and she made a big hit. I have heard that she always uses this perfume now, no matter what the play may be. Of course it is only a woman's fancy, and yet I have heard that Miss Coghlan would rather lose her wardrobe than her perfume. Patti also has a similar fad. When she made her first great hit, she wore a pair of shoes of peculiar pattern. Patti wears in her concerts now shoes made on this identical last and of the same pattern. She believes they bring her luck, and apparently they have done so. Yes, stage folk are a bit superstitious. You probably have all seen would be funny men thrown off the stage at rehearsal for quoting some of the hoodoo passages in 'Macbeth.'"

"There is very little or no connection," said the colonel, "between these little foibles and spiritualism, but the conversation suggests it. You would all probably be surprised to know the number of well known actors who believe in spiritualism. Billy Florence was a spiritualist, although few people knew it. I knew him as intimately as any one, and he has often talked about his belief to me. Bartley Campbell was another, and so is McVicker of Chicago. Ada Isaacs Menken is now simply a name to you youngsters. She was a clever woman, as well as a very beautiful woman. The elder Dumas and many other men of letters were among her friends. She wrote two volumes of verse, which, she claims, were inspired by the spirits. These verses consisted of musical lines of varying length, and they attracted some attention. I'm not a spiritualist, but I am a firm believer in hoodoos and occasionally in mascots. Let's have a nightcap."—New York Sun.

A Young Maine Samson.

Lemont M. Leavitt was born in June, 1886, in the old town of Turner. About the first thing Lemont began to do after he opened his eyes and uttered his first cry was to grow. His strength increased daily, and when five years old his skill with the ax attracted much attention. He would chop more wood then than half of the hired men could, and his services were much sought by young men in the neighborhood who were too lazy to do their own chores on the farm.

Last summer the youthful giant tendered a genuine surprise to his parents and neighbors. A party of men were building a wire fence near by. A pole was run through the center of a very large coil of wire, and everything was in readiness to unwind it, when it was found that a man expected to assist could not get there. Master Leavitt happened along, and, taking in the situation, picked up one end of the pole on his shoulder and marched off, keeping step with the man who held the other end in his arms only by the greatest exertions, while the man behind hung on to the wire while it was being uncoiled. Thus for nearly half a mile did this six-year-old Samson bear the burden that would have made many a full developed man shrink.

Just think of it, not quite six years old, yet Master Leavitt tips the scales at 108½ pounds in a light suit. He is active, both physically and mentally.—Auburn (Me.) Gazette.

A Bold Attempt Frustrated.

Not very long ago Mrs. S—— received what was apparently an authentic telegram from her husband, who had been looking at several country places along the sound with a view to purchase. The message ran as follows: "Meet me at Stamford to sign papers. Nelson from office will call for you at 12 and accompany you." Thinking the telegram a perfectly natural one under the circumstances, Mrs. S—— donned cloak and hat and waited her husband's emissary, who shortly arrived in a cab. He was a stranger to her, but not being familiar with all the clerks in the office she suspected nothing, and was about to depart with him to the station when, by a strange coincidence, her husband, who never left the office till late in the afternoon, was seen walking up the street.

As he told his wife afterward, he had occasion to use some important paper that he had left in his safe at home. As Mrs. S—— turned toward him, expressing her surprise at seeing him when she had supposed him to be in Stamford, the pretended clerk jumped into the cab, called out some directions to the driver and was driven rapidly away. Of course the message was bogus, but Mrs. S——'s fine solitaires, which she constantly wore, and her costly rings were not bogus, and her excitement and fright may be imagined when she found that her husband never wired her to meet him at Stamford at all.—New York Tribune.

The Youngest Traveling Man.

Two weeks ago we had commercial travelers here in capes and skirts and lace. Now there is one in knickerbockers. Fourteen-year-old Loie Walker, who is selling tobacco and representing a newspaper is the youngest drummer on the road. He started out from Winston, N. C., seven weeks ago on his first trip, and has been as far as New Orleans in the west and to Tampa in the south. That Master Walker is a bright lad goes without saying. He has a pair of sparkling brown eyes and a pleasant, honest face. Loie says that he has had a good trade.

He was a New York boy until a few months ago, when his father moved to Winston. He has had good training, and did something Sunday quite original for a drummer—went to church twice. Loie talks well and is polite and modest. He will sell goods where any one else can. He has one advantage over the older men on the road—he can travel on half rate tickets.—Atlanta Constitution.

A Statue of Buddha.

One of the large marble statues of Buddha in the loan exhibition shortly to be opened in the museum of the university has an interesting history. It was obtained in the east by Dr. Charles Huffnagle at the time of some uprising, it is said the Indian mutiny, and bears the marks of bullets, which have broken the hand and part of the arm. After being exhibited in Memorial hall it was sold at auction with the remainder of Dr. Huffnagle's collection in Philadelphia. It now finds a permanent abiding place, where it was identified by the bullet marks as the historical statue.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Pineapples in America.

Over 12,000,000 pineapples were landed at New York last year. The price ranged from four to sixteen cents each. In England, where they are scarce, and obtained almost wholly from hothouses, the price is often from two to five dollars each. In the New York tenement districts they are retailed at one cent a slice.—New York Ledger.

Swore That She Was Over a Hundred.

Mrs. Louis Martin, a full blooded Chippewa Indian, who died at her home in Allouz, Brown county, Wis., recently made a sworn statement to a priest before her death that she was 108 years old. She gave corroborative evidence. She was born in a wigwam near Green Bay.

The wholesale price of whalebone is now $10,000 per ton. On the strength of this a large whaling fleet is about to start on a six months' cruise to the Antarctic ocean, where whales are thought to be plentiful.

Numerous grandchildren of both the contracting parties attended the wedding of a groom of seventy-five and a bride of seventy-one at Crawfordsville, Ind., a few days ago.

A grand total of charitable bequests in England during 1891, excluding Baron Hirsch's benefactions, is stated at $15,000,000, as against $11,505,000 during the preceding year.

POLITE ROBBERS.

Recollections of Gentlemanly Nevada Road Agents of Early Days.

RESPECTED AND POPULAR CITIZENS.

They Made Big Hauls, Wore Good Clothes, and Had Plenty of Money.—Victims Who Were Feted.

Some of the Nevada road agents had physiognomies that indicated native viciousness and depravity, but the majority of them were of the good citizen type to which they belonged until accident sent them off at a tangent, while Jack Davis, the most notorious of them all, might readily have been mistaken for a studious professional man or a clergyman of extraordinary placidity and meekness. They were good neighbors, pleasant acquaintances and associated on an equal footing with the leading men of their respective communities until the prison door closed suddenly upon them and interrupted the friendly intercourse. The judges, lawyers and bankers of the Comstock, when sitting down to a game of poker could have welcomed no one more warmly to a seat than they did Jack Davis.

From the time the stages began carrying their immense loads of bullion from the mines and bringing large shipments of specie in return, stage robbing became one of the most lively and productive industries in Nevada. The week that went past without one or more coaches being held up produced a general feeling of dull times. But the energetic road agents seldom let the community settle into dejection of that character. From the Placerville, Henness, Dutch Flat, Reese River, Humboldt, Esmeralda or some other route, intelligence of a robbery could be depended upon pretty nearly every day with a comforting degree of certainty. Most of the depredations, however, were committed near the large towns, to which the highwaymen would return and mingle with the crowd before the arrival of the plundered stage, or before news of the occurrence was brought back, if it were a departing coach.

There was little or no indiscriminate waylaying in those days, such as has been practiced by degenerate members of the profession in later times. The robbers ascertained what particular stage offered a rich prize and then went for it. They had spies hanging around the express offices, confederates in the service of the stage companies, and employed various other means to obtain this information. A stable boy has been seen to swing his lantern after the departure of a stage, like a railroad conductor signaling the engineer, and within five miles the coach would be stopped and robbed. Poor Baldy Green, one of the old time drivers, was held up so often that he was finally discharged, either from a superstitious belief in his bad luck or a suspicion of his fidelity.

For several years there were very few convictions in comparison with the number of offenses. There was never much doubt regarding the identity of the bolder operators, and arrests were frequent enough, but the difficulty was to obtain proof of their guilt. The trial of Jack Harris, Al Waterman, Mose Haynes, Pitcher and Love in 1865 for the robbery of a stage near Silver City was the first notable arraignment of this kind. The result was not very satisfactory. Harris, the leader, was acquitted, Haynes escaped punishment by turning state's evidence, Waterman was sentenced to fifteen years in the penitentiary and the others to shorter terms.

I do not recollect if Waterman was pardoned or if he got out of prison through some legal technicality, but any way he was at large again within a year, and Wells, Fargo & Co. condoned his felony and took him into their employment at a high salary to do nothing. It will strike the average reader, I think, that this was holding out a rather strong inducement for others to render themselves eligible for a like promotion. But Waterman did not long enjoy his sinecure. His position as a pampered favorite of the great express company made him haughty and overbearing, and he was killed in Virginia City a couple of years afterward.

Meantime the stages were robbed as regularly as ever. It was evident that bolder and more skillful men were devoting themselves to the duty. In 1866 two stages, both crowded with passengers, were stopped together at the top of a steep ascent on the Geiger grade by seven highwaymen and treasure boxes and passengers' pockets rifled alike. The robbers extemporized a fete champetre for their victims, generously regaling them with a quantity of champagne discovered in the boot of one of the coaches. Rugs were spread for the ladies, and the affair was conducted throughout in the courteous and elegant style of old time highwaymanry.

Davis had long been suspected of directing the principle operations on the road. No particle of convincing evidence could be brought against him, however. To all appearance he was a substantial and prosperous millman. Together with Squeers, Cockerill and some others he had taken a lease of a quartz mill near Flowery, in Sixmile canyon, about four miles from Virginia City, and seemed to be running it profitably. No one could discover from what source paying rock was obtained, nevertheless the mill kept turning out a steady stream of bullion.

The fact was, as it transpired afterward, there never was any paying rock. The mill had been hired to facilitate the remelting and marketing of the bullion acquired by the numerous stage robberies. Davis and some of his companions were arrested after the Geiger grade robbery, and on one or two other occasions, but it was found impossible to gather testimony enough to convict, and they were discharged.

The building of the Central Pacific and the Virginia and Truckee railroads was a severe blow to these industrious millmen. All the treasure was thereafter carried by train with the exception of unimportant shipments to and from outlying districts.—San Francisco Chronicle.

A Queer Silver Wedding Performance.

Thursday was the twenty-fifth anniversary of an Augusta couple's marriage. On that morning the husband, upon awakening, asked his wife how they should celebrate their silver wedding. The wife did not suggest any particular observance of the day. The husband then said: "Shall we remarry or separate." The wife said it was immaterial to her either way, and what suited him would satisfy her. He then said he would just as leave part as not. The wife acquiesced, and she packed up her trappings and left the house, and they have remained apart ever since, and neither have sought the other or proposed reunion or any other sort of celebration.—Augusta News.

An American Girl in London.

"Many years ago a young American girl," said Colonel T. W. Higginson in a lecture, "found herself in London as the guest of a relative, who was the wife of an embassador to England from a continental state and a person of great social standing and influence. This young lady, only seventeen years of age, was, in a way, to enter upon easy terms the most exclusive society. You can imagine how she enjoyed it. At the first of these entertainments to which she went her eye fell on one very distinguished looking old man in the opposite corner, who seemed to her a person who might be worthy of any social position; not handsome, rather ugly than otherwise, but keenly intellectual and in every way distinguished. After awhile the summons was given to the dinner table—they were summoned to the dining hall in that complicated and elaborate order of precedence which you will find at the end of the English books on etiquette. This young girl saw every stripling lordship and every young damsel, the scion of an honorable house, pass her by, and she watched from her corner.

"Last of all, at the very end of that brilliant procession, walked the only two untitled plebeians in the room, that young American girl and that distinguished looking old man, who turned out to be Samuel Rogers, the distinguished poet of those days, and the recognized head of literary society in London. It was a lesson in the utter shallowness and folly of hereditary rank that would last a lifetime. Samuel Rogers' poems are not read so much now as formerly, but at that time the highest literary honor a man could have was to dine with Rogers. He was one of the richest bankers in London, and was probably or possibly the only person in the room who had won for himself a reputation outside of his own little island; but he was next to nobody in that company, and the little American girl was the nobody."

The Science of Ventilation.

The healthy atmosphere in a room is one in which the air is changed to the extent of 3,000 cubic feet per hour per adult inmate. The air admitted need not be cold; warmed air, so long as it is fresh, is of course preferable to cold air in winter, but in some way the air must be brought in if we are to continue in health. There are various ways of doing this. One is by admitting cold air so that it is directed upward toward the ceiling, where the air of a room is at the highest temperature; the cold stream is then heated in its passage as it falls to the lower level for breathing. But in large rooms, to utilize at its best this current, there should be in the skirting outlets communicating with a heated upcast flue, which will draw away the heavy air near the door. In cases where there is heating by hot water coils, the cold air may be brought in at or near the floor level and passed through the hot water coils—the outlet for vitiated air being in or near the ceiling—to a heated upcast flue.

The great desideratum in the admission of fresh air is to cut it up into very fine streams, something in the way water is cut up in passing through the fine rose of a watering can. It has been found that air admitted through a tube or orifice of equal sectional area throughout enters as a cold draft, but if the inlet be through a series of small truncated cones, the smaller section outward, the larger inward, with a wire gauze on the inside, the current is so cut up and diffused that the draft is not felt. By analogy a mass of water entering through a narrow canal drives all before it and cuts a channel for itself, but the same quantity passing over a large surface of ground gently irrigates it. Another important point is not to let the passage of the air be at too great a velocity. The gentler the flow the better.—Contemporary Review.

The Change in Women.

"Your friend is very charming," remarked one woman to another, as a third left the two. "I was going to say the most charming I ever met, but nowadays one meets so many agreeable women it is fairly impossible to institute lines of comparison. How women have changed in the last few years in this respect—grown so much more delightful, I mean."

"They have developed," replied the other, who is noted among her friends for her devotion to her sex. "It was always there, but not always brought out."

"Certainly not for each other," answered the first speaker. "I remember a dozen years ago, when it was high and rare praise to say of one of our sex 'she is as agreeable to women as she is to men.' All the little fascination of manner and scintillations of wit and wisdom used to be saved for the mixed companies, and a women's gathering was a tame and spiritless affair. It is so no longer, however, and it is when I am going to a woman's club or luncheon or tea that I like to be in my freshest and best moods."—Her Point of View in New York Times.

A Woman's Advice About Eyes.

A Frenchwoman who knows what she's talking about has this to say on the subject of eyes:

Never rub your eyes, nor allow your children to do so from their cradles. Veils are bad for the sight, especially those spotted or covered with a pattern; so eschew veils when you can, or wear the softest, clearest net when obliged to do so. Never read in bed or when lying on the sofa. Sit with your back to the light when engaged in reading or working. Pale blues or greens are the most restful wall papers for the eyes, whereas red is exceedingly fatiguing. Do not read, write or work longer than two hours together without resting your eyes and closing them fully five minutes. Be most careful to live in a dry house on dry soil. Attend to the digestion, for did not Milton declare his blindness to proceed from the effects of dyspepsia? If the eyes be weak bathe them in a basin of soft water, in which a pinch of table salt and a dessertspoonful of brandy has been added.

The Right Kind of a Girl.

Let a girl be ever so graceful in the dance, let her be ever so elegant of walk across a drawing room, ever so bright in conversation, she must possess some other qualities to convince the great average run of young men that she can be the manager of his home, the pilot that steers his ship of state. Frugality, womanly instincts of love for home, an eye to the best interests of her husband and the careful training of her children—these are the traits which make the good wife of today, and which young men look for in the girls they meet. Men may sometimes give the impression that they do not care for common sense in their sweethearts, but there is nothing they so unfailingly demand of their wives.—Edward W. Bok in Ladies' Home Journal.

A Good Thing to Remember.

THE ROSCOE TRAIN ROBBERY.

The Los Angeles Herald contains the following:

"The men who ditched and robbed the train at Roscoe station early last Friday morning, evidently went on the principle that as lightning never strikes twice in the same place, that would be the very safest place on the road to repeat the affair of a few weeks ago. If the parties who perpetrated the first robbery are the same as those who did Friday morning's business, they greatly improved this last time on their diabolical methods. Instead of bringing the train to a stand on the track, they opened the switch and let it run into the ditch, notwithstanding that by so doing they might have compassed the killing of all on board. As it was, only the engine and tender were wrecked, and only two lives were sacrificed.

This thing of holding up trains by robbers is becoming a crime of such frequent occurrence, and is so perilous to life, that the state as well as the companies will have to resort to drastic measures in order to put an end to it. Until the express companies adopted the plan of placing a fearless guard on the stages running from the mining districts, the number of hold-ups and successful robberies of the treasure carried were very frequent. After that this kind of crime was greatly diminished. The highwaymen found that the only way to accomplish their design was to deliberately shoot the guard from ambush, and as this undoubtedly increased the risk of the robbers, and made their job far more hazardous than before, there was at once a very noticeable diminution in the number of these affairs.

The express company and the railroad corporation ought to provide a safeguard to their trains something like that which has been found to work well on stages. An armed guard of two or more determined men should be placed in the front part of every passenger and treasure train. Had there been two well armed men of nerve on the train that was held up at Roscoe, they could have made it very hot for the robbers. Men who made it their busines to fight train robbers would be prepared for them, and would use all the finesse of experience to not only defeat them in their designs, but to give them such a reception that they would reflect deeply before they made another attempt. In the end the companies would find it cheaper to send out a guard on each train than to incur the losses they now sustain by the successful robberies they are periodically subjected to.

The deplorable thing about this robbery is the loss of the life of a faithful servant of the road. Indeed, murder is a usual accompaniment of this kind of crime; but in this case the wretches had planned for a wholesale murder, which would have happened if the the entire train had been ditched. This aggravation of the deed should spur the police authorities and the express company and the railroad directors to a relentless pursuit of the robbers. Neither money nor the right kind of men should be lacking in order to run these bandits down and bring them to condign punishment.

The calamity howlers have occupied public attention since Congress assembled by shrieking against "tariff tinkering" by the Democrats. Let the the people understand that after the close of the war in 1865 up to the time when the Republicans lost their grip in 1890, there were twenty different tariff acts passed and approved by Republican Presidents. There was enough "tariff tinkering" then to suit the calamity howlers, but it was of a kind that always increases the burdens on the laboring people and enabled the manufacturing monopolists to pile up wealth that was produced by the labors of the oppressed. The Wilson bill is the only chance there has been for "tariff tinkering" in the interest of the great common people of this country.

MARRIED.

FORBES—YANDELL.—At Camp Independence, February 20, 1894, by Rev. S. W. Albone, P. W. Forbes and Miss Jennie Yandell.

Bar silver, 63¾.

Neil McLean came up from Keeler yesterday.

Mike Reddy came to Independence yesterday from Darwin.

The Board of Education has been in session all the week.

Dr. West has been convicted of the murder of Addie Gilmour.

John Leidy was down from Bishop a couple of days this week.

D. Stubblefield has nearly recovered from his recent severe illness.

District Attorney Forbes visited Bishop in the early part of the week.

Several people went from Independence to the celebration at Big Pine.

O, men of little guile, beware of the bunco-steerer when you visit the big Fair.

It is reported that Chris Evans has been captured, and that no blood was shed in the act.

F. E. Densmore, Esq., has been admitted to the Nevada Bar by the Supreme Court of that State.

The Mid-Winter Fair is to be continued until October. After June 30 the admission is to be reduced to 25 cents.

R. Way was down from Bishop early in the week. He was inquiring in regard to contracts for masonry on the big canal.

Frederick Stock arrived in New York on Tuesday on his way from London to Los Angeles. He will soon arrive at Independence.

The Independence Brass Band gave a social dance at Mairs' Hall last evening. It was well attended and a good time enjoyed.

A most unusual wind storm raged through the valley Wednesday and Thursday. It died away last night and to-day the weather is most delightful again.

R. Love and T. F. A. Connelly were down from Bishop early in the week, attending a meeting of the Directors of the 18th District Agricultural Association.

A big train wreck was reported on the Central Pacific early in the week. It is said that seven engines and the big snow-plow were ditched. Mrs. F. Raine, who was to have arrived at Independence on Wednesday, delayed her trip in consequence.

Another big train robbery occurred near Los Angeles last week. The San Francisco express was derailed at Roscoe, the fireman being killed, by means of a misplaced switch. There were three robbers, one at each side of the train kept up a fusilade of bullets while a third placed a dynamite bomb against the door of the express car, blowing it open. The messenger was covered with a rifle while Wells Fargo's box was robbed of all its valuables.

Last night an exceeding beautiful display of aurora borealis was seen in the northern heavens, beginning about seven o'clock and lasting until midnight. The sky became permeated with a deep carmine hue, with great streamers of white light reaching nearly to the zenith. It is a very unusual occurrence to see the "northern lights" in this latitude and the phenomena last night was the most brilliant ever witnessed here.

W. J. Dunn brought his two stallions down from Bishop to Big Pine yesterday. Stranger, the stallion Mr. Dunn bought at San Jose last fall, is a magnificent looking animal. He is a dark seal brown, about seventeen hands high and weighs 1465 pounds. He is bred in trotting lines, his sire having a record of 2:26¾. Stranger has fine trotting action and has a record of 2:34¾ to cart, and a half mile in 1:11. As an all-purpose horse he cannot be beat in any country.

Washington's Birthday.

The celebration at Big Pine yesterday was marred but by one thing, the inclemency of the weather. Had it not been so cold and disagreeable many more people would have been present. As it was there were a good many visitors from the surrounding country. In the afternoon a game of baseball, seven innings were played between the Laws nine and a mixed nine of Big Piners consisting of three white boys and six Indians. The game was won by the latter, the score standing 17 to 25. Immediately after the ball game there was a quarter race between a sorrel horse brought by Chas. Leonard from the South Fork, now owned by George Carpenter, Little Tom, owned by John Countz, Black Colt, owned by J. M. Horton, and Borego, owned by I. H. Mulholland. The race was won by the Leonard horse, Borego and Little Tom lapped about fifteen feet behind, and Black Colt pulled up. In the choice of tracks the Leonard horse had by far the best of it, the race being through a lane where the ground was soft on both sides of the wagon track and the latter horse having hard road to run in all the way. There is no doubt, however, but that he could have won had all things been equal. No time was given. In the evening a dramatic entertainment was given in the hall connected with the Big Pine Hotel, followed by a ball. Big Pine did itself proud. Every visitor was cordially welcomed and made to enjoy himself thoroughly.

Board of Education.

The Board of Education met at Independence last Monday, all the members being present, as follows: President, H. H. Howell; Secretary, J. H. Shannon; H. C. Hampton, Mrs. I. C. Mulholland and F. E. Densmore. Applications for examinations were made by Kate Arcularius, Eva L. McGee, Alice Williams and Nancy Bodle. Applications for certificates on credentials were received from Grant P. Hatch, California Normal diploma, Cornelia Duren, same, Mattie L. Steele, same, Isabel Crmpbell, California Life diploma, Elva S. Smith, Vermont Normal diploma, Maud Truscott, Reno Normal diploma. Applications were received from Mamie A. Coughlin and Grant P. Hatch for recommendation to the State Board of Education for document to accompany State Normal diploma. Applications were received from H. H. Howell for a renewal of Grammar Grade certificate and Miss Nellie Reynolds for renewal of Primary Grade certificate. On motion H. C. Hampton was excused from preparing questions to be used in examination. The remainder of the week has been occupied in examining applicants.

Found a Market.

E. Robinson arrived home from Los Angeles on Tuesday evening. While there he was successful in making contracts for the sale of his beef cattle at good prices and expects to deliver them some time during the coming month. Like all others who visit Los Angeles Mr. Robinson was greatly surprised with the evident prosperity and rapid improvement of that city. New buildings are constantly being erected and the city is spreading out in all directions. In a few years it will not only be the metropolis of the South but of the whole State. Notwithstanding the great business depression all over the country Los Angeles appears to be thriving and business of all kinds is brisk. Mr. Robinson says there are reported to be upwards of fifteen hundred miners prospecting in the neighborhood of Goler. There is a decrease, however, in the amount of gold being brought into Mojave. The bunch grass is just starting on the desert, the season being much later than usual.

Directors Meeting.

Directors of 18th District met at Independence on Monday evening, Feb. 19, to appoint a committee to prepare a report of additional statistics relative to new enterprises and industries not already listed in regular report. These facts will be printed in report of State Agricultural Society, and will be a limited compendium of information for many who may desire to know something of our county. The Directors appointed Director Rhine and Secretary Yandell to submit the report. Directors Shepherd and Rhine were recognized as members of the Board upon credentials of appointment from the Governor. Board adjourned to meet on April 2, 1894, when arrangements for the next Fair will be completed.

Acquitted.

The case of the People vs. Hughes and Jones was closed in the Superior Court at noon of Friday last and District Attorney Forbes made his opening statement in the afternoon. On Saturday morning P. H. Mack, Esq., addressed the jury for the defense, followed by Mr. Forbes' closing argument. The case was given to the jury at noon and after deliberating about five hours brought in a verdict of "not guilty." On motion of District Attorney the cases against Islay and Payne were dismissed, as no stronger case could be made against them than the other two.

Andy Dell arrived at Independence yesterday on his way home from Los Angeles. He succeeded in disposing of all his horses but the price received compared with former years was very low. In fact it does not pay expenses. Rowan and Cardinal have not yet succeeded in disposing of all their stock.

A strike of good pay gravel is reported to have been made near the old Pasmore diggings in the Alabama Hills. There are several parties at work there who are taking out gold in paying quantities. There is a considerable area of placer ground there that with a head of water could be made to pay very rich returns.

Last Tuesday evening at the residence of A. N. Bell at Camp Independence, District Attorney, P. W. Forbes and Miss Jennie Yandell were married by Rev. Albone. The wedding was a very quiet one, there being no guests present. The contracting parties have our cordial wishes for a bright future.

KENDALL'S SPAVIN CURE.

STOCKTON, CAL., Dec. 19th, '92.

DR. B. J. KENDALL CO.

Gentlemen:—Having read one of your Treatise on the Horse and seeing the Spavin Cure advertised, I thought I would try it. I had one horse with a prominent Spavin of 12 months standing. I removed it with ½ bottle. I tied up one fore foot on same side the spavin was and compelled the horse to rest on lame leg while I took a surcingle and drew it across the hock or spavin until the hock or spavin got very warm with the friction, then putting on Spavin Cure. I had a mare that had a running from her nose for 12 or 14 months. I rubbed the Spavin Cure from her eyes down to nostrils, then from back of jaw bone down under the throat for a week. I have not seen any discharge for two months.

Yours truly, HUGH McDADE.

Not on the Deacon's Line.

The two young men had induced the deacon to take his first Turkish bath. They had gotten him properly attired, or rather unattired, and had conducted him into the hotroom.

The deacon didn't enjoy it, but he was game. He rolled around nervously on his cot, and every time he moved he seemed to strike a hotter spot. But he stood it like a man until the perspiration made rivulets innumerable in running off him. Then he lifted himself up on his elbow and said plaintively:

"Let's get out of this."

But the young men only laughed and told him to keep quiet; that it was just getting comfortable.

When he finally absolutely refused to stand it any longer they led him into the steamroom and sat down to gossip and enjoy his discomfiture as he felt himself slowly boiling away.

And the deacon seemed inclined to lose his temper. It was aggravating to be so extremely uncomfortable when they were apparently enjoying themselves, and would offer him no means of escape that would, to say the least, be dignified.

But there was an end to it; he got out, and as he looked "more in sorrow than in anger" from one to the other of them, one asked:

"Well, deacon, what do you think of it?"

The deacon replied solemnly and with all due dignity, but rather pointedly:

"It's a good thing, young man; it's a remarkably good thing for some people who need to suitably prepare themselves for the hereafter, but for my part I am glad to get on the surface of the earth again."—Chicago Tribune.

Music and Health.

I am strongly of opinion that vocal music is conducive to health, and I believe that if children, particularly girls, were to devote more time to singing there would be fewer victims to chest complaints, for such an exercise must tend to develop the organs of the chest. Of course it might not be beneficial in every case, but I think that in the majority of cases plenty of exercise in singing would pay well from a health point of view. The schools might therefore appropriate more time to training in this respect, for I hold that health should be made the first consideration, and school is certainly the place where the most good could be done.

Some years ago a Dr. Rush, dealing with this subject, stated that "the exercise of the organs of the breast by singing contributed very much to defend them from those diseases to which the climate and other causes expose them. The Germans are seldom afflicted with consumption, nor have I ever known more than one case of spitting blood among them. This, I believe, is in part occasioned by the strength which the lungs acquire by exercising them frequently in vocal music, which constitutes an essential branch of their education." Another authority stated that he had heard of people strongly disposed to consumption being restored to health by the exercise of the lungs in singing.

These statements certainly deserve consideration, more particularly as the remedy for such a serious complaint is a very simple one. To me it seems perfectly reasonable to think that singing should expand the chest and thus better qualify the frame to battle with disease.—Cor. London Tit-Bits.

Happy Ahashuerus.

"When I went to sea," said an old yarn spinner down on the wharves, "I was very handy aloft and answered to the convenient name of 'Jack.' I was so willing and handy that the officers were always calling upon me. It was 'Jack, do this,' or 'Jack, do that.' On one voyage from Havana to Philadelphia the mates called on 'Jack' so much that I was well nigh worn out. I determined to be 'Jack' no more. After arriving in Philadelphia and remaining there a few days, I went to the shipping commissioner's office for a new job. He said he wanted a man for a captain who was even then waiting in the office, and requested me to sign my name.

"'I cannot write,' I said.

"'Then tell me your name,' said he.

"'Ahashuerus Vitz Van Deuzendorff,' said I.

"'What?'

"'Ahashuerus Vitz Van Deuzendorff.'

"'How in thunder do you spell it?'

"'I don't know.'

"'Here, captain,' said the commissioner, turning to the waiting captain, 'this man seems all right but for his confounded name.'

"'That's all right,' said the captain, and I was shipped. And I will tell you I had peace and comfort on that voyage. Whenever the mate wanted me to do anything he would start on my name, break out swearing and then tell another man to do the work. I think they rather suspected something wrong about the name, but they never caught me."—Portland Press.

Whose Face Was It?

One of the most remarkable as well as the most interesting relics of prehistoric man ever found in America was discovered by James Cormack and Daniel Rees, 200 feet beneath the surface of the ground, at Angus, Dallas county, Ia., when the famous Coal Town shaft was being sunk. The relic in question was a perfect human face, composed of indurated clay. It was something more than half the usual size of the human face, with a nose and forehead of the general contour known to the anthropologist as "the Aztec type." Everything, even to a deep indentation across the cheek and a mole at the side of the nose, goes to prove that the find was not simply a baked clay image, but that it had been fashioned from a plaster cast or death mask of some human being that had once lived and breathed.

Mr. Rees, one of the discoverers of the curiosity, was superintending the opening of the mines at the time. He is an honorable gentleman, and his word is considered good wherever he is known. He says that the mysterious specimen was found imbedded in a stratum of clay or shale, just above the coal, which in that part of Iowa lies from 200 to 220 feet beneath the surface. Taken altogether, it is believed to be the earliest trace of prehistoric man yet found in America. The discovery is enough to make one's flesh tingle with mystery when he asks himself the question, Whose face was it?—

LIEUTENANT LOUISA.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

In ten seconds the boat would have been overturned and we should have been shot into the lock. But Mary retained her presence of mind. With a vigorous shove of the hitcher she pushed the stern of the boat off the pile, and by the greatest good luck we avoided what must have been a most serious catastrophe. Even as it was we got athwart the lock and nearly came to grief. This episode has been thus particularly referred to because it was the one that settled me. I made up my mind as we rowed down to Bisham after exploring the backwater at Harleyford and the tumbling bay at New Lock that I would that day ask Mary to be my wife. That she liked me I felt sure, but whether her liking had developed into love, whether she would entertain my proposal, or whether my proposal would entertain her, I knew not. But I was fully resolved to put the matter to the proof; I would risk it if I could get the opportunity to do so, and opportunities can be manufactured.

We landed at Bisham to look at the church and inspect the fine old monuments of the Hoby family and others for which Bisham is celebrated. Then I proposed that the Bolds should scull Mrs. Macfarlane, who was tired, down to Marlow, while I took the girls through the Quarry woods to the point and back over the meadows to Marlow. L'homme propose. He does, indeed! I, for example, proposed to ask Miss Bruce to be my wife, and that was the only proposition that came off. Whether Mary had given the Macfarlane girls a hint, or whether those young ladies (how I hated them!) acted of their own volition, I do not know, but they were limpets; or, rather, taking into consideration their lanky and flaccid structure, they were barnacles. They stuck to us with the pertinacity of ungorged and unsated leeches, and gave us no chance of a moment's uninterrupted talk until at length they landed us at the Complete Angler. Fortunately the dinner was a good one, or the faculty for making myself unpleasant would have been abundantly exercised. My devices were not as yet exhausted.

After dinner I persuaded the Macfarlanes and the Bolds to go up the town to see the house where Shelley lived and where he was visited by Byron. Mary had once before made a pilgrimage to that shrine and so had I. Mrs. Macfarlane's views inclined more to forty winks than to poetical associations, and she at last fell asleep in her armchair. Mary and I sat on the lawn for some minutes and watched the passing boats. Neither of us seemed to have any remarks to offer. Finally, I asked her whether she would cross the road a few yards only and inspect Mr. Borque's garden. She consented, with some diffidence.

"It isn't right to leave auntie," she said. "What will she say if she wakes up and finds that we are gone?"

I felt inclined to say, "Oh, bother auntie!" Instead of that I exclaimed that five or six minutes would serve to walk round the garden, so that our absence would not be likely to be discovered. We crossed the road and entered the inclosure.

When a man does a thing for the first time in his life he is apt to be awkward about it. For the life of me I did not know how to begin. I was as nervous as a recruit under fire for the first time; my heart thumped away as if it didn't like the business and was anxious to get out and away. What I did possessed at all events the charm of unconventionality.

I grasped Mary's hand suddenly, and before she had time to utter a word I said, looking her straight in the face:

"Mary, will you give me a kiss?"

She blushed violently; she returned my point blank look and what she saw in my eyes apparently satisfied her, for in a moment I was hugging her to my breast and sealing our troth with a loving kiss.

How happy I was! Happy? I felt as if heaven itself had been opened to me. And she?

"Charlie," she said (I had hated the name before, but how sweet it sounded now), "Charlie, my darling—I never thought you—do you really love me?"

One more kiss—the last I got for many a long and weary day—and we went back to the hotel. The others had not returned. Mrs. Macfarlane was just awake.

"I should like some tea, Mary," she said.

Tea! Ambrosia—nectar—was more in my way. I could scarcely realize that Mary cared for me. But I was happy beyond measure. As to the future—what was to come of it all—a fico for the future! How we got back to town I have no recollection. A four horse coach, perhaps, or a balloon was our vehicle. All I know is that Mary was sitting opposite me, her blessed eyes ever and anon meeting mine and giving me assurance of love. The Bolds and I saw them off, at last, in Mrs. Macfarlane's carriage, and then we returned to the Temple. I must have been very incoherent.

"What jolly girls the Macfarlanes are!" Edward remarked.

"She is—lovely!" I replied.

"She? Who?"

"Why, all of them," I ventured.

And then, in fear that I should betray myself, I suddenly remembered an appointment at the Lotus club and went off on a long walk. Involuntarily I found myself in Inverness terrace, gazing up at the drawing room windows. They were open, but there was no sign of Mary. I trudged away down the Bayswater road, across Addison road to Kensington, and so back to the Temple. I shut myself into my room, lit my lamp and tried to read.

Suddenly a grim shadow crossed my mind. Mr. Campbell Bruce—what would he say to all this?

He was reputed to be wealthy, and I knew he was proud. What would he think? Was it likely that he would give his daughter to a man whose income was but £250 a year and what he could earn as a guerrilla of the press? Was it likely?

It was not. No use blinking the fact. It was improbable in the highest degree. Expectation, even, I had none. The only person who was at all likely to leave me any money was my Aunt Johanna; and she, good soul, was as tough as a grenadier and as long lived as a parrot. Her personal appearance, moreover, reminded one of that beauty fowl. Out of a clear three thousand a year she spent about five hundred, so that her accumulation must, I knew, be large and her income increasing year by year. But would she make me an allowance? That was the question. Or would she—but no! I knew the old lady too well. She was as tenacious of her money as a dog of a bone and as proud of it as a cook of her copper. Once when I was in a pecuniary scrape at Oxford I had applied to her. Her reply was characteristic:

VILLA CAMPANARE, NICE.

MY DEAR CHARLES—If I were to accede to your request for £30 I should be doing you a great wrong. By having to get out of your scrapes yourself, you will learn to avoid them and acquire self reliance. Thirty pounds, my dear Charles, is a sum of money. Avoid debt, and you will be spared what cannot but be painful to you. Read the enclosed. Your affectionate aunt,

JOHANNA.

"The 'enclosed' was some horrible trash about a man who came to London with twopence and died worth a million. As to thirty pounds being a sum of money, what did she suppose I imagined it to be—a sack of potatoes?

Well, the recollection of this incident failed to dispel my present misgivings, and that night I wrote to Mary telling her that I would see her father at once, but that until I had done so she was to keep our engagement secret. And I went to bed with despair at my heart.

I tossed about all night and had but short and fitful intervals of sleep. In the morning I was in a high state of fever, varied by frequent fits of shivering and shooting pains all over me. I sent a telegram to my doctor and then went back to bed.

For three months I was laid up with a dangerous rheumatic fever. In the early stage I had found it necessary to take Edward Bold into my confidence, and he had regularly conveyed tidings of me to Mary, who, poor girl! suffered grievously for my sake. Her messages gave me heart and strength, but my prostration was great and the paroxysms of pain frequent. At last the muscles of the throat were affected, and I could neither eat, drink nor sleep. Laudanum was administered in large and increasing doses and brought me some temporary relief; but I overheard my dear friend, George Vivian, my doctor, say one day:

"If he is not better in forty-eight hours it is all over with him."

My Aunt Johanna was not the sole possessor of the parrot constitution. It ran in the family. Therefore, feeble and near to death as I was, I made up my mind that I would pull through. There never was a kinder nurse than wizened, uncouth Mrs. Crump (Mrs. Swatman's mummified assistant before mentioned) turned out to be. The hired nurse was as callous and repugnant as nine out of ten of her class are, but Mrs. Crump, who would tend me while the professional took her daily exercise, was a ray of sunshine in the room. She was always good humored and hopeful; she smoothed my pillows, raised my head or arranged the bed with the lightest of hands. Often did I scream for her when the hired nurse was causing me the most acute pain by her rough handling. Nurses are born, not made. But at the best I had a hard time of it. Those who fall sick in chambers are apt to suffer grievously. More than once during those forty-eight hours I feared that the parrot constitution would be worsted after all.

However, they passed, and I was not dead yet. I began to mend; slowly but surely the improvement went on, and in due time I became so far convalescent as to be able, with assistance, to get from one room to another. A new trouble now loomed in my horizon. On looking into the state of my finances I made the unpleasant discovery that, after settling various liabilities incurred by my illness, I should be left with a balance of not more than ten or twelve pounds at Praed's, out of which there would be a heavy chemist's bill to pay. My dividends were not due until December, and I was debarred from forecalling them by the provision of the will under which I obtained them, and which forbade me to "assign, charge or encumber" the property, under penalty of seeing it depart into the clutches of a distant connection. Not without much reluctance, therefore, I resolved to write to my Aunt Johanna and ask her to come to my assistance. After I had done this a feeling of conditional resignation came over me. I had swallowed my pride, and such a dose, after all the other nostrums I had been taking, ought surely to bring about some sort of improvement in my unlucky state.

The same day on which I wrote this letter to my aunt I was enlivened by a call from Mr. Bruce. He had looked in on me several times during my illness, and had made the kindest inquiries as to my progress. He now sat down on the other side of my fireplace and we had a long conversation about genealogies and pedigrees, Mr. Bruce's second (hobby) horse; and before he took his leave I had become tolerably well acquainted with the story of the famous Dunedin peerage, and with the efforts Mr. Bruce had made during twenty years past to make good his claim to the title. One link, however, and only one, was still wanting to the completion of the chain of evidence forged with so much perseverance. It was necessary to prove the marriage of Dalrymple Bruce and Tryphena Maddams—a runaway couple who were supposed to have been united in matrimonial bonds somewhere about the year 1794. Their marriage certificate had been advertised for and a large reward offered for it in every newspaper in the three kingdoms. Hundreds of registers had been personally inspected, but the much desired entry had never been discovered. Gradually, as I listened to my visitor's narrative of his baffled but still hopeful efforts, something of his own enthusiasm and eagerness in the pursuit communicated itself to me. Probably I was in a more than usually impressionable state, owing to the bodily weakness caused by my illness, but at all events when I put my hand in his at parting I felt that I sympathized with him heartily, and that, had it been in my power, I would have assisted him so far as in me lay.

"And who knows but I might be able to assist him?" I said to myself after he had gone. "There are more reasons than one why it would be desirable to put Mr. Bruce under an obligation. Mary, Mary! What if the discovery of your great-great-grandmother's marriage register were to bring about the creation of our own? Oh, Mary! I wish I might see you now. I shall never be quite my own man again until the light of your sweet eyes has shone on me once more. Ah, me! if it were possible. Well, and why not?"

Homer speaks of "brazen footed steeds," from which we naturally infer that in his day horses were shod with bronze or brass. Two reputable ancient writers tell us that the mules of Nero wore silver shoes.

Why It Was So.

Our butler has an exalted admiration for my husband, and the other day he came to me and said: "Mrs. Blank, I do think Mr. Blank is the handsomest man I ever did see. I looked at him a-goin down the steps this morning and I says to my self, 'There ain't a better lookin man in New York city than Mr. Blank.'" So then I asked him, "James, what do you suppose induced Mr. Blank to marry so homely a woman as I am?" He looked at me for a moment and then replied solemnly, "Mrs. Blank, it was God's will!"—Interview in New York Sun.

"SWEET SIXTEEN."—AN EXQUISITE CALENDAR.

Hood's calendar, which is always looked for with interest and pleasure, has made its appearance for the year 1894, and is in many respects more beautiful than ever. The head is that of a lovely girl just "sweet sixteen," lithographed in delicate and natural colors. Besides being a thing of beauty, the calendar is especially valuable for the general information presented.

The figures are plainly printed in pleasing and harmonious colors and the effect as a whole is most satisfactory. The calendars can be obtained of almost any druggist, or by sending six (6) cents in stamps for one and ten (10) cents for two to C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass. An edition of over eight millions of these calendars was printed in order to supply the immense demand. This seems a simple statement, but its meaning is almost beyond human conception. The card used for the upper portion of this number of calendars would cover nearly fifty-two (52) acres of ground and the paper consumed in making the pads, if cut in one continuous strip of the same width as the pads, would be over eighteen thousand (18,000) miles in length.

These calendars are issued by the proprietors of Hood's Sarsaparilla, the well known medicine which has gained such renown by its wonderful cures in cases where the blood was poisoned or impure. The history of this preparation is entirely unique, the business having grown from a small retail trade until, at the present time, the great laboratory in which it is made has a capacity for fifty thousand (50,000) bottles a day, and is the largest building in the world devoted to the manufacture of a medicine. The sales of Hood's Sarsaparilla in all sections of the country are enormous. The proprietors have never claimed that it would cure every ailment, but they show by thousands of testimonials that Hood's Sarsaparilla purifies and vitalizes the blood, builds up the system and cures those diseases caused by impure blood and debility, such as scrofula, salt rheum, catarrh, rheumatism, etc. As a preventive of the grip, Hood's Sarsaparilla has proved to be unequalled, and it restores the wasted vital forces after a siege of that dreaded malady and fortifies the system against future attacks.

The fact that great care is exercised in the preparation of this medicine and that nothing has ever been claimed for it except as warranted by previous cures has much to do with the confidence felt by the public in its curative powers. The motto of the proprietors is, "It is not what we say, but what Hood's Sarsaparilla does, that tells the story, and it is what Hood's Sarsaparilla has done, as shown by the published statements of persons whom it has cured, that has placed it at the head in the field of medicine in the present day.

WHEN WAR IS DECLARED

Against a man's happiness by his stomach, the enemy may be pacified and brought speedily and easily to terms. That potent regulator of digestion, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, disciplines the rebellious organ thoroughly. Indigestion arises from weakness of the stomach, and the food in it, for want of the power to digest, decomposes and acidifies, giving rise to heartburn, flatulence and pain, besides a multitude of symptoms both changeful and perplexing. But peace soon reigns when the great stomachic is resorted to and used with persistence. Dyspepsia gives rise to morbid discomposure of mind, and even sleeplessness and hypochondria in chronic cases. To the complete dismissal of these the Bitters is fully adequate. Liver complaint, constipation, debility, rheumatism and malaria are completely subdued by this genial medicine.

Many people travel on their faces, but the Chinaman gives his photograph to the collector in order that he may stay.

"DIE LORELEI."

"I love you," I said, in the gathering gloam,
As we wandered slowly toward her home;
"I love you above all else," I cried—
She more and more on my arm relied,
In the spirit hush of eventide.

"I love you," I said, and a tender blush
Arose in the west o'er the evening's hush.
"I love you"—and then I saw the glow
Deep on her face in its richness grow,
While footsteps lingered in paces slow.

"I love you"—my arm stole around her form,
While her bosom shook in the sudden storm;
The stars looked love from their nests on high;
The sweet moon smiled through the trees near by,
While night crept gently from out the sky.

"I love you," I whispered so low and sweet,
While my lips searched round in her hood's retreat,
And two hearts beat in the throb of one,
So smooth did the course of our love then run
In holy calm, when that day was done.

"I love you!" in anguish I later cried
'Mid the roaring wave and the rushing tide;
And clouds of a hopeless night hung dark
Above and around my tossing bark,
While the wild winds shrieked a fateful "Hark!"

"I love you still!" from across the wave
Rolled the answer grim o'er a yawning grave;
The air was filled with a soulful sigh
Of the siren luring me on to die;
Too late I knew 'twas "Die Lorelei."

A NATIVE AMERICAN TEA.

Mate Is Its Name and Hosts of People Like It.

"Taste that," said a tea merchant to a reporter the other day, as he handed him a curiously shaped bowl full of a thin, brownish liquor with something that looked like a tobacco pipe resting in it, bowl downward. The reporter put his lips to the stem of the pipe and sucked at it cautiously.

"What is it?" he asked. "It tastes like weak tea."

"That's just what it is," answered the merchant, "but it's a brand of tea I'm pretty sure you never tasted before. That's a genuine American tea—grown in America, cured in America, indigenous to America and consumed in large quantities for years by hundreds of thousands of Americans, and yet I'll be bound you never heard of it."

"Perhaps not," admitted the reporter guardedly. "What state is it raised in? Is some four story brick tea farm down here in Water street responsible for it? Willow leaves, arsenic and a patent essence of theine, or something of that sort, eh?"

"Not at all," said the merchant, a little indignant. "It's a perfectly genuine and unadulterated article. Its native state is Paraguay, and that country raises enough for its own consumption and 5,000,000 pounds annually for export to other South American countries."

"Oh, South American," exclaimed the reporter. "You misled me by saying American."

"Did I?" said the merchant sarcastically. "And why, pray? That's one of the annoying peculiarities of this people. They're too conceited to get themselves a distinctive name, but in a lordly way dub themselves Americans. They speak of Brazilians, Canadians, Chilians, Paraguayans and the other millions of Americans as if they had no right to that title at all."

"But about the tea," interrupted the reporter apprehensively. "What do you call it?"

"Mate is the name of it," replied the merchant, "pronounced 'mat-eh.' And many South Americans are very fond of it. You have just had the pleasure of drinking it in the native manner. That curious bowl is not made of papier mache, as you might think, but is a gourd, trained into that shape while growing. The natives are experts in that line, and by binding the green gourd here and there with cords, or bending it one way and another, they make it take a diversity of shapes before it becomes ripe enough to be cut, dried, scooped out and used as a utensil.

"It will not stand fire of course, but the mate is first put in the gourd, and then boiling water is poured on it. After a few moments a pipe or tube is inserted, and the liquor is then drawn off by suction.

"What looks like the bowl of the pipe," continued the tea merchant, as he lifted it from the liquid and allowed the reporter to examine it, "is in reality a strainer, which prevents the grounds from reaching the mouth. It is made in the shape of a bulb or ball, and this one is a curiosity in its way, for it is all woven by hand, in very fine meshes, from a species of dried grass. Metal ones are more common, and the rich have silver strainers. This is an old style one, and I value it on that account. It is called a bombilla.—New York Tribune.

International Money Orders.

I believe that there should be a reduction in the rate on international money orders. At present it is eight cents on a $10 order and forty-five cents on a $100 order. These rates should be reduced one-half. Dr. C. F. MacDonald, superintendent of the money order system, has recommended the increase of the maximum amount of a single international money order from $50 to $100. Such a change would produce uniformity in respect to the maximum amount between the domestic and the international money order, and would, besides, tend to reduce the expenses of the international money order system, inasmuch as for sums from $50 to $100 a single order would be required in lieu of two, as at present.

Since the postmasters and clerks who issue the orders, and the exchange officers who certify them, are compensated for their labor, not upon the basis of the amounts of the orders, but upon that of the number of transactions at a fixed rate per transaction, the lessening of expense in the item of clerk hire in postoffices would be by no means inconsiderable. There is a steady increase in this branch of the government's business.—Ex-Postmaster General James in Century.

A Really Poor Author.

When Dr. Johnson was a resident of Grub street he made the acquaintance of a poet named Samuel Boyse, whose poem on the Deity and other works had earned him high praise. Boyse could not go abroad to seek work because his clothes were in pawn, so he lay abed with his arms thrust through two holes in the insective blanket, which was his only covering, writing and starving. Johnson raised enough money to get his clothes for him, but two days later Boyse was in bed again, eating a stew of beef and mushrooms purchased by the repawning of his suit. "I might as well eat while I may," he said, "for I must some day starve, whether I will or not."—Collector.

SHE TURNED THE TABLES.

But Luck Deserted the Strategic Wife at the Last Moment.

Dinner was ordered at half past 6. At 7 o'clock Trotter reached home and was met at the door by his wife, all resplendent in evening dress.

"Great Cæsar!" he cried. "What's the meaning of this?"

"I merely wanted to be prompt for once," she answered sweetly, "and not keep you waiting tonight before going out. Come, my dear, the soup is on the table."

The poor, tired man sat meekly down and took a hasty mouthful. "It's stone cold," he gasped.

"Is it?" was the gentle reply. "I'm so sorry. It was ready just in time."

He said nothing, but devoted a great deal of time to thought. The overdone, tasteless dinner was hurried through with until the coffee came. Trotter took a deep draft and was unable to breathe for a moment. It was redhot, having been on the stove during the period of waiting. Still he maintained a dignified silence and laid down the cup with a sigh.

"Come, my dear," said his wife, referring to a slip of paper in her hand. "Never mind the coffee—bad for your nervous system. Hurry up stairs now and get ready."

"What!" he gasped.

"Yes, dear, that is what you said last time. I have it all written down here. Now, dress quickly and don't keep the carriage waiting more than four hours."

He remembered the quotation and rose meekly from the table.

Then began a race against time. He cut himself thrice in shaving, lost a collar button, ruined a beautiful shirt front in putting in his studs, but notwithstanding was dressed in 28 minutes and came down stairs just as the carriage rolled up to the door.

"Ready at last, eh?" read his wife from the paper.

"Yes, my dear," he returned mildly.

Just then his wife turned for a brief glance in the mirror before arranging her cloak, and as she looked a sudden torrent of tears burst forth.

"Oh, Tom!" she cried, "why didn't you tell me? M-m-my hair is coming down and h-has to be fixed all over. I-I'm so sorry."

But the cruel man only sat down, drew out a cigar and laughed, and as his wife darted up stairs he cried after her: "I say, my dear, won't you leave that paper with me? I want to know just what to say."—New York Herald.

The Need of Muscular Exercise.

The English volunteer movement and the popularity of the bicycle have tended to counteract the disuse of the muscles engendered in a large proportion of town residents, but there are still numbers of persons of both sexes who require vigorous muscular exercise in order to maintain health. The centralization of many domestic industries may have improved the character of the products thus manufactured or of the work performed, but when bread was made and washing was done at home the female members of many families fairly well off, but not too richly endowed with this world's goods, were profitably employed in kneading the dough and ironing the linen.

Healthy exercise of the muscles being in many cases no longer regarded as a necessity for the maintenance of well being, the latter end of this century has produced the revival of a practice which is recorded in the earliest medical papyrus in the British museum verifying the old adage that there is nothing new under the sun.—National Review.

A Nose Three Hundred Feet Long.

There is a remarkable natural curiosity on a small tributary of the Mohawk river in Montgomery county, N. Y., known all over New England as "Anthony's Nose." It is situated on the extremity of a mountain called "the Klips," and when viewed from the river at the entrance to the highlands has the perfect shape and general appearance of a human nose at least 300 feet long! Opposite Fort Montgomery, in Putnam county, on the east side of the Hudson river, there is another nose shaped projection known to the frequenters of that locality as "The Old Man's Nasal Appendage."—St. Louis Republic.

Russians During the Turkish War.

I was struck with the utter absence of enthusiasm and the dislike to the war. In the canteen tent I frequently heard officers of the guard who had not yet been under fire making use of such expressions as, "Ah, if I were only lucky enough to be back in St. Petersburg," or, "I'd give somebody a good round sum to give me a slight flesh wound," etc. The wounded in the hospital frequently spoke in indignant terms of the officers, which, as a rule, is certainly not the habit of the Russian soldier.—"Experiences of a Prussian Officer."

A Chance For an Inventor.

The railroad companies should contrive some way by which both sides of the car shall be the shady side in summer. It would save strangers a great deal of anxiety when making choice of seats, and of course the companies would make more money, as it is fair to suppose that the seats on both sides would then be taken.—Boston Transcript.

IRELAND'S POLICE.

An Armed Guard That is Distributed all Over the Emerald Isle.

CENTRAL AUTHORITY IN DOUBLIN.

How the Irish Constabulary is Controlled, Equipped and Disciplined.—12,000 in the Ranks.

The Irish constabulary has been in existence in its present form with but few alterations for the last thirty-five years, having been originally organized by Mr. Drummond, who was under secretary for Ireland from 1835 to 1840. Before this date the peace was preserved in Ireland by barony constables appointed by the grand jury and the lord lieutenant. They were quite incapable of subduing any serious riot, and the fact that they were armed and equipped in a different manner in nearly every county interfered with their harmony of action and caused them to present the most ludicrous contrasts when a number were assembled together for any particular duty. Mr. Drummond, who had a great talent for organization, soon after his arrival in Ireland replaced them with the constabulary of Ireland, as it was first called. This force was uniformly armed and equipped and was controlled by one central authority in Dublin.

From time to time the force was increased and additional duties were imposed upon it, until now it numbers nearly 12,000 men, and in addition to performing the ordinary police work for all Ireland (with the exception of Dublin, which has its own police) some of its members also perform the duties of revenue officers, taking agricultural statistics, the census, etc., and lately many of the constabulary were employed in regulating the distribution of relief in the congested districts.

As I have said, the force now consists of about 12,000 men, who are graded as head constables, sergeants and constables. It is officered by an inspector general, Sir Andrew Reed; one deputy inspector general, three assistant inspectors general, thirty-six county inspectors and 227 district inspectors, the latter being divided into three classes, according to their seniority.

The admission to the force as an officer is their physical qualifications. The successful candidates have no difficulty in obtaining a nomination from the lord lieutenant; but as very few vacancies occur annually the competition is unusually keen and candidates require to be exceedingly well posted in the subjects on which they are examined.

Candidates must be unmarried and under twenty-six years of age, and must be able to undergo a severe medical examination as to their physical qualifications. The successful candidates are sent to the Dublin depot as cadets for three months, during which period they are on probation and receive only the pay of a sergeant—viz., £75 8s. per annum.

At the expiration of about three months the cadet is usually appointed a third class district inspector when his pay, with allowances for a horse, a house and a servant, etc., is increased to close on to £300 a year, and as soon as a vacancy occurs he is drafted off to a county, where he is placed in charge of a district, under a county inspector, and then his responsible duties may be said to commence. From time to time he is moved from one district to another, gradually rising to the position of first class district inspector, when his pay is increased to between £400 and £500 a year, including allowances. His next promotion will be to the rank of county inspector, when his pay is slightly increased, and in this rank he will probably remain, retiring at the age of sixty-five on a pension of about £500 a year.

The rank and file are nearly all Irish and chiefly the sons of farmers. On enlistment they are also sent to the depot to be drilled and put through a course of musketry, as they are armed with the Snider carbine. After becoming efficient they are drafted off to counties and districts. No man is taken who is less than 5 feet 9 inches in height, and all must produce a good character and be able to read and write well. So little difficulty is experienced in getting recruits that there are at present the names of 460 candidates on the roll kept by the commandant of the depot in Dublin. The pay is very good, rising from about £40 yearly to about £150 as a head constable, including allowances.

The men are neatly dressed in a dark green uniform, and are armed with Snider carbine, sword bayonet and baton. The latter is the only weapon usually carried, except at night and in disturbed districts, when it is generally supplemented with a revolver or carbine.

There is exceedingly little crime among the men, drunkenness being almost the only serious offense, and that being very rare, which is rather a wonder when you consider in what desolate and wretched places two or three constables may be stationed with no officer near them.

Part of the duty of the men in these country places is to patrol at night, every patrol being out from three to six hours, a portion of the time being always spent in ambush with a view to surprising moonlighters, etc. One of the most uncongenial duties of the police is to protect the sheriff and his subordinates at an eviction.

In addition to the ordinary police force on foot there is also a small mounted force whose members are usually quartered in the larger towns. The force has always been conspicuous for its soldierly bearing, loyalty and steadiness, and also for the extraordinary efficiency displayed in performing police and detective duties under circumstances of unparalleled difficulty.—New York Herald.

TALKING SHOP.

A Very Disagreeable Habit Which the New Yorker Indulges to the Extreme.

Very few people realize how utterly stupid and uninteresting to an outsider is the almost universal habit of "talking shop"—that is, keeping the conversation in channels of exclusively individual interest. New York people especially are wont to consider their local interests paramount, and when a visitor from any other city or any one who is not in their "set" happens to be among them they almost invariably ignore them and talk "over their heads," as it were, leaving their unfortunate guest to glean what amusement he or she can from the purely personal talk which is not in the least interesting to an outsider.

This criticism is more applicable to women than to men and is particularly noticeable in the fashionable set. Masculine interests are naturally broader and more cosmopolitan, and men's talk therefore is not so circumscribed. But woe be to the stranger who finds herself left to the tender mercies of a fashionable lot of women in New York. She is simply and entirely "out of it" and is alone in a crowd, the most unendurable solitude imaginable. This is not an imaginary charge to bring against New York women, by the way. It is a well known fact and one that has frequently been commented upon.

Less rude perhaps, but quite as boring to an outsider, is the disposition to "talk shop" in the way of servants, children and various other domestic matters on the part of kind hearted matrons, who would not for the world intentionally neglect a guest or a visitor. But who cannot fancy that any other subject can be so interesting as their servants' delinquencies or their children's illnesses? What can be more tiresome to an outsider than to be suddenly dropped into a community who have some common interest in which he is totally uninterested? We are all such egotists, after all, and it seems so natural to think that what absorbs us should interest others that it is hard for us to realize that we may on occasions be both selfish and ill bred.—New New York Tribune.

An Electric Shaving Pot.

An addition to the recent electrical appliances has appeared in the shape of an electrically heated shaving pot. This pot can be made instantly available in any room to which current for light is supplied. The base of the pot is hollow, like the bottom of a champagne bottle, and a lamp is slipped inside, the bottom of the pot being closed up by a metal reflector having a circular hole in it, through which the neck of the lamp passes into the lampholder fixed on the base.

A small amount of light passes out below the reflector through a ring of glass just above the cap of the lamp and is reflected by the white base below. This light is more than sufficient to use the apparatus by in a bedroom. One point in which this appliance differs from other electric kettles is that lamps of various candle power can be readily inserted. The water can be kept hot with an eight candle power, boiling with a 16 candle power, or rapidly boiled with a 50 candle power. The cost of using this pot for the daily shave for a week is about 2 cents.—New York Telegram.

How Javanese Settle Quarrels.

The Javanese manner of settling quarrels is quite original. When one man has offended another, the injured party gives notice that he is angry by drawing in the sand before the door of the offender a circle with a straight line across it, indicating that his affection, which would have been eternal, has been cut in two. Friends of both parties then shut them up. They parley awhile, then pretend to be born again, prattle as little children, and finally as men become reconciled and embrace. Should one be refractory and refuse to be conciliated, he is ostracized by the community so effectually that he is soon brought to terms. It is just possible that our enlightened citizens might consider this method better than knockdown arguments and certainly much cheaper than going to law.—Harper's Bazar.

Rules For the Napkins.

There is a good deal of uncertainty as to whether it is or is not the thing to fold a napkin after a formal meal. If one is staying in the house and knows that napkin rings are in use there, it seems a reflection upon that custom to fling the napkin down in an untidy heap. An elegantly appointed table deserves better treatment, even at the end of the meal, than those disheveled piles of napery too. Therefore it always seems fittest to simply half fold the napkin and not attract attention to it either by one obtrusive habit or the other.—Philadelphia Press.

Don't Chew Toothpicks.

Don't, oh, don't chew toothpicks after meals. I have seen, says a correspondent, the most charming looking girls dancing out of fashionable dining rooms with toothpicks clinched between their pearly teeth as though their lives depended on it. A drowning man will clutch at a straw, they say, but a woman should be going down for the third time before she should clutch at a toothpick.

A TEXAN'S NERVE.

The Minister With the "Old Plug Hat" had Plenty of Courage.

SUBDUED A PAIR OF DESPERADOES.

A Ranger's Yarn About the Days When Texas was not so Much Civilized as it is at Present.

At one of the social meetings held at a clergyman's house recently an old Texan was a guest. Although advanced in years his figure was tall, straight and athletic, and evidently he had been a man of action and adventure. His hearty, natural manner and ready conversation soon made him a favorite with all present. Some one in the company suggested that he might describe or tell a story of frontier life. Said he:

There are a good many stories to tell about that kind of life, and I hardly know what to pick out suitable for church folks, but perhaps you might like to hear about "Old Plug Hat," a young Methodist minister who came our way nigh on to thirty-five years ago.

Well, about that time a young, slender chap came to our cattle ranch, which was something like forty miles west of San Antonio. He said he had studied for the ministry in some Connecticut college, I forget which, had broken his health, wanted to rough it with us to see if he could get strong again, was willing to do anything for his keep, or would pay his way. His pleasant, frank way won the boys at once. One of his peculiarities, which I suppose came from his prim Yankee training, used to amuse us. Every Sunday he'd carefully fix himself up city fashion, and his shiny silk hat appeared odd among a score and more of sombreros. Some one playfully nicknamed him "Old Plug Hat," and he was oftener called that than anything else. He never bored us with church things.

About three months before he left for his home, two noted desperadoes, part Mexican, part Indian, but really more devil, made their appearance in our region. They were known as Black Mex and Big Cactus. They had been long feared and hated border terrors on account of their cruel, cunning, bloodthirsty character.

We and the ranchmen near us felt rather gloomy when we found out that the wretches had appeared in our neighborhood, for we realized that sooner or later some of our bands would muster a man or more less. You see, those weren't railroad days down there then as now, and there were times when one or two of us had to ride on errands to town. Several good fellows were robbed and killed in the first six weeks after they began to prowl. One was from our camp.

It got so serious that we called a crowd together and held a sort of a council of war. Mind you, there was plenty there who would have openly faced one or both of the rascals, but nobody wanted to run recklessly into an ambush. Lots of plans were suggested as to how we might squelch or capture the miscreants, but nothing seemed to fit the case without foolish risks.

"Old Plug Hat, how would you like to tackle 'em?" half playfully asked one of the company of the young parson, who modestly sat in the meeting.

To the surprise of the boys the youngster eagerly rose and said:

"I'll willingly take the chances, and was only waiting to ask the privilege. I'll make the next trip to town alone, and if I meet with the scoundrels and they don't get the pull on me, I'll guarantee to wipe them out; so please make a motion that I'm to go."

Somebody who didn't want to see the young feller's feelings hurt by leaving him out of the talk made the motion. I at once seconded it and urged that the boy be allowed to try himself as a scout. While the youngster was making his offer it was plain to me that he had hit upon some ingenious scheme that only needed good luck and courage for a trial. My war record, such as it was, gave me a good deal of influence with the boys, and as I seemed satisfied to risk my chum, it was finally agreed that Plug Hat should go. When the meeting broke up I asked him what his plan was, but he only laughed and said, "If I come back you'll find out."

The second morning afterward he started. He picked out a good horse, put on his Sunday clothes, silk hat included, filled his belt with revolvers, fastened his saddlepouch and bade us goodby, making most of us feel pretty glum. Well, to shorten the story, that night while we were at supper into camp rode Plug Hat. He dismounted coolly, sat down among us and began to eat. He couldn't answer the thick volley of questions given him, but after supper, in a quiet, commonplace way, he told us about his adventure.

He had ridden about twenty miles from camp, and had turned out of Red Stone pass to cross a quarter mile lonely spot that led to an easy riding road. He was half way across when from behind the rocks or foothills out sprang Black Mex from one side and Big Cactus from the other. Of course they "held him up," as it's now termed. Cactus seized his bridle and covered him with a revolver. Mex held another at his ear and made him dismount. He then took all of the revolvers from his prisoner's belt and sounded his bosom and pockets for any that might be hidden.

Then he made him sit down a few feet away and proceeded to rifle the pouch. Cactus kept the boy covered, but as the latter was deprived of his belt weapons and would not be likely to attempt a knife attack upon his brawny captors, even if he had a bowie, vigilance relaxed. In one of these unguarded seconds off came the plug hat, out of it flashed the famous short barrel, and two of the worst fiends that ever pestered the southwest were out of existence.

Well, we and the boys, far and near, were mighty proud of Plug Hat, and some of the ranch owners offered to stake him high or take him in pards. He wouldn't stay, and he soon started north to preach.

Did I ever see him again? What was his real name? Yes, I've seen him nearly every New Year's since I've settled north. As for his name, if he'll quit scowling like a hungry Comanche and stop shaking his head like a balky mustang, I'll introduce you to him right now!—New York Tribune.

Stories of Great Luck.

Captain Ben Ferguson, collector on the ferryboat Hite, is always reminiscent. The other day the captain said to me: "You seldom hear of a man making $90,000 in one night in these days, but I know of such an instance. Mr. Coleman, who ran a foundry on Washington street, near Brook, did it. In relating it to me he exhibited no delight whatever. His words were: 'Captain, I made $90,000 last night; went to bed early and slept soundly. You know the price of iron went up, and fortunately I had enough on hand, which I had purchased at a low figure, to net me a fortune.' As Captain Ferguson concluded the story he told another of how Dennis Long made $200,000 because the price of iron dropped out of sight. It was just at a time when Mr. Long had failed in business and told Captain Ferguson that he was $400,000 in debt.

"Well," said the captain, "Dennis Long went up to Indianapolis to bid on the construction of the city waterworks. There was but one other bidder, and Mr. Long was awarded the contract. Not long after iron began fluctuating, and Long's estimate having been made on the basis that iron would advance still more in price, it already being high at the time, he of course found that as it decreased he was reaping a golden harvest. Well, iron went down and down. When it stopped, it was worth hardly anything. Mr. Long, as I said, made $200,000 by this, and he's been making money ever since."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Rats Are Great Travelers.

Rats do not, as one would suppose, remain on the ship, but get off at various ports, and after remaining a while ship on some other vessel for another voyage. The water rats or wharf rats are great travelers and make frequent voyages around the lakes and even around the world—the latter as I discovered while engaged in West India service. There are here now rats from almost every part of the globe. Why, I saw four colossal Jamaica rats, with their white bellies, skipping about in the moonlight a few weeks ago, and only yesterday I killed two Indian male rats not 200 feet from where we were standing.

Rats are great climbers when they find it necessary to be so. Upon one of my voyages not long ago we had a long spell of warm weather, and there was no water in the hold which the small army of rats on board could get at. One night we put some water up at the cross trees and waited for the result. Well, the rats just swarmed up the ratlines and went for the water. We killed as many of them as we could as they came down, and some of them jumped overboard and were drowned. But we could not kill them all, and a few made the entire voyage with us.—Interview in Chicago Tribune.

Bismarck's Advice to Students.

Only now, and in a roundabout way, via Bonn, has the text of the speech which Prince Bismarck made at the reception of Bonn students become known. The prince confessed that at the university he neglected study, but added: "The only thing that I am sorry for on looking back to those times is that I could not later on make up for what I had neglected then. What one has learned afterward does not remain so firmly in one's memory. I do not dissuade you from working, but I am not horrified if my sons commit studentlike excesses, and above all things I believe that the student's life in corporations has this advantage—that it somewhat steels the character by subjecting each to the criticism of his comrades. This is a great thing. As long as one belongs to a corporation, to the opinion of which one attaches much importance, one does not easily go astray. The same thing plays an important part later on in life. What is it that is the backbone of German officials? The university and the sword-knot."—Berlin Cor. London News.

How to Live if You Wish to Live Long.

Aside from the very important and controlling influence of inheritance, of diet and of temperate habits, the points to be learned from the few statistical data attainable are that longevity is promoted by a quiet, peaceful life in a retired and rural community, where there is freedom from nervous strain and worrying and excessively laborious toil. The business man, with increasing cares and responsibilities, the mill operative toiling hard to keep together the souls and bodies of himself and his family, the politicians, the hardworking professional men, are not the chief contributors to the centenarian ranks. Dr. Holyoke indeed became a centenarian, but his example has rarely been followed by his professional brethren.—Boston Medical and Surgical Journal.

Where "Sterling" Came From.

Sterling signifies money from the legalized standard of coinage of Great Britain. According to one theory the term originated as follows: It is a corruption of Easterling—a person from north Germany, on the continent of Europe, and therefore from the east in geographical relation to England. The Easterlings were ingenious artisians who came to England in the reign of Henry III to refine the silver money, and the coin they produced was called moneta Easterlingorum—the money of the Easterlings.—New York Evening Sun.

Lightning and Rain.

It is popularly supposed that the sudden downpour which usually follows a bright flash of lightning is in some way caused by the flash. Meteorologists have proven that this is not the case and that, exactly to the contrary, it is not only possible but highly probable that the sudden increased precipitation is the real cause of the flash.—St. Louis Republic.

Why Fogg Is Puzzled.

"There are two things," remarked Fogg in a contemplative mood, "that I don't understand. One of these is how the world got along before I came into it and the other how it is going to get along after I have left it."—Exchange.

SILENCE REIGNED.

How a Chinese Banquet was Ruined by a Mongolian Ward McAllister.

DUPLICITY OF A SOCIAL DICTATOR.

Honors to a Minister Plenipotentiary That Plunged the Celestial 400 Into Gloom and Anger.

The Four Hundred and more of Chinatown—that is to say, the 400 and more chicken butchers, pawnbrokers and sausage manufacturers, were in a wild flutter of social excitement. The inciting cause of the furore was the dinner given by the Merchants' Exchange of Chinatown to the minister plenipotentiary from Peking, Yang Yu, and the score of pig tailed diplomats in his train. On the previous evening his excellency had been dined in the true oriental style by the Chinese Six Companies and Attorney Riordan, and last night it came to the turn of the unclassified men of trade in the Mongolian colony to stuff the representative of the Celestial empire with all the delicacies known to their cuisine.

The restaurant is situated on Dupont street, near Commercial, in a three story structure, with balconies in the oriental style and a profusion of tinsel, red paint, Chinese lanterns and music that would set the teeth of an alligator on edge. To this repository of Mongolian delicacies all the invited guests were proudly wheeled in American hacks piloted by acute Jehus who figured with grim satisfaction on the glorious opportunity to afflict the heathen and in some degree even up matters by charging them six prices for the unaccustomed luxury of a ride in a four wheeled chariot.

The hour of the dinner was 7 o'clock to the minute. In Peking this is the fashionable time for taking the evening meal, for the law of Confucius has so set it for all time in China.

Precisely at 7 o'clock the hacks began to roll up to the Dupont street restaurant, and the anxious but delighted pork butchers, cigar stuffers and fish peddlers began to roll out and elbow each other up stairs in the trial of the plenipotentiary, from whom they were separated by 20 diplomats in costumes that looked like the hand painted nightshirts conferred on popular bridegrooms by admiring female relatives. The merchants were also attired in long flowing garments of the robe de nuit pattern.

The guests were soon seated without any ceremony, but with much sorrow, for a cold blooded social plot developed itself the moment that the banquet hall was reached.

It was expected, of course, that the plenipotentiary would take a seat somewhere in the main banquet hall, where the orators of Spofford alley, which is noted for its eloquent speakers, would have a free whack at him. One fat pork butcher had a roll of Chinese lithographed eloquence in his pocket, and several Jackson street and Cum Cook alley financiers were about as well heeled. It promised to be a great night for the Chinese language, and in expectation of a prolonged flow of eloquence a brass band and an extra stock of rice brandy had been provided. The unexpected, however, happened, as always does occur on momentous occasions.

The Ward McAllister of Chinatown is a sleek pawnbroker who does business back of the Jackson Street theater. His dictum is supreme court law on all social questions within a radius of six blocks of his store, and he naturally fell into the position of chief director of the night's festivities. He had been much sought after for several days by aspiring merchants who desired to sit as close as possible to the plenipotentiary, and every wire was pulled to further such ambition. Merchants who can draw their checks for four figures approached him under the delicate pretense of being hard pressed and soaked their silver watches. He has done a roaring trade for several days, but his prosperity is at an end.

It is suspected that he tacitly allowed at least 50 merchants to believe that he could rub elbows with the plenipotentiary. Matters reached such a crisis at 7 o'clock that there was nothing left for the Mongolian Ward McAllister but to snub the whole band of ambitious guests and thus get himself out of the frying pan, so to speak, by jumping into the fire. To the unspeakable consternation of the guests, the head of the grand procession did not stop when it reached the middle of the spacious banquet hall, all bedecked with berries and redolent of burning sandal wood, odoriferous punks and delicious birds' nest soup, which, next to boiled cauliflower and corn beef and cabbage, is the most fragrant of all kitchen concoctions.

Right straight ahead went the plenipotentiary, piloted by the Mongolian McAllister, and before the paralyzed merchants could catch their breath the minister and suit were out of sight in a snug chamber at the farther end of the banquet hall, where all that could be seen of them was the occasional flutter of the plenipotentiary's fan or a glimpse of a diplomatic foot stuck out beyond the edge of a screen that hid it from the vox populi.

A distressing silence fell on the assembled merchants, and dark and significant scowls were turned on the Mongolian Ward McAllister, who, after ushering the plenipotentiary out of sight, took a seat with a couple of athletic looking pork butchers in a distant corner of the hall.

The menu, which comprised everything in the markets of Chinatown, was discussed with evident pleasure by the plenipotentiary and the diplomatic corps, for occasionally bursts of merriment come over the screen from their room, but the motley crowd in the main hall had neither eyes nor stomach for the feast. They chewed mechanically on their shark's fins and went through the pretense of shoveling rice and mince duck with their chop sticks, but their appetites were gone, and the only thirst that afflicted them was a thirst for vengeance on the man who had humiliated and betrayed them.

After feasting for an hour and a half in this sequestered nook the plenipotentiary and suit reappeared, and bowing to the merchants, who kowtowed right and left, strode down stairs to their carriages and rattled off to the Stockwell theater.

The Ward McAllister of Chinatown let himself out of the restaurant through a skylight, and at the latest accounts was awaiting the society reports of the banquet in The Spofford Alley Gazette on the roofs of Chinatown.—San Francisco Chronicle.

FRIDAY, MARCH 2 1894

The frequent brief dispatches from Germany relating to the silver question indicate that the subject is becoming a very live one in William's dominions. Von Caprivi has been closely allied with the gold monometallists since and before his elevation to power, but Bismark has for many years manifested a strong leaning towards bimetallism. It is just possible, now that the old Chancellor has secured the ear of the Emperor again that he may pour into it some sensible suggestions, which may bear fruit that will benefit William and the German people. Certainly William can have no desire to see the present depressed condition of trade in his country continue. It only needs an influential person with a thorough knowledge of the subject, such as Bismark has, to make it clear to the Emperor that the repression of enterprise in Germany and throughout the civilized world is wholly due to the depreciation of prices. This idea once grasped by the young Emperor, it is safe to say that he would not be long in throwing the weight of his influence to restore the old condition of affairs, when gold and silver formed the money metals of the world, and commercial men were not continually apprehensive of the result that must flow from the diminution of their combined volume.

The cyanide process of extracting gold is likely to do much for Colorado in the treatment of ores of low quality, as it has succeeded wonderfully on the Randt in South Africa. At present on old methods, ores which produce less than one ounce and a half troy are unprofitable, but there are thousands of tons averaging four and a half ounces being raised weekly in Colorado, and there is now a much greater activity shown in gold mining than when silver held the field. The product will be more than doubled this year. In 1893 it was $8,500,000, and it is estimated that this year it may reach to $25,000,000. All of the arts of the metallurgist, however, do not get rid of the high charges for transportation of ores. Some other economy is needed for that leakage.

Arthur McEwen's "Letter" is the latest addition to the San Francisco press, and it is no joke to say that it "fills a long felt want." Mr. McEwen is the leader among California journalists and is in the position to tell the whole truth in his "Letter." The first victim was M. H. de Young, editor of the "Chronicle" and an aspirant for the United States senatorship from California. Mr. de Young was literally roasted and can no longer hope to gain the coveted place as a senator. Mr. McEwen proposes to show up the frauds among the business men and politicians of San Francisco, and no man is better qualified for the task than he. The subscription price of the "Letter" is $4 per annum or ten cents per copy.

They do not seem to have much need of court interpreters in Luzern county, Pa. where the district attorney, whose name is Gorman, speaks not only English and French, but also the Polish (Magyar), Lithuanian and Slav tongues. The working population of that county is composed very largely of those nativities; and young Gorman mastered all those dialects thoroughly before attaining his majority. The advantage of such an officer in examining foreign-born witnesses is almost incalculable in these days of industrial troubles, when every mob of rioters is lead by some person of alien parentage.

At a late meeting of the Hawaiian council in Honolulu the committee on judiciary reported in favor of choosing delegates to sit with the council and prepare a constitution for a permanent form of government. Although there is an overwhelming feeling in favor of annexation, it is considered time to change from a provisional to a permanent government, which can entertain all questions relating to annexation on an independent basis.

Mr. Waldorf Astor's London newspaper objects to the course of Admiral Benham at Rio. Most English newspapers do, and it is natural that the Anglomaniac grandson of a German fur peddler should fall into the same way of thinking.

Paris seems to be thoroughly sprinkled with dynamite bombs. It will require the heads of several Vaillants to quell nihilistic disturbances in the French capital.

DIED.

DODGE—At Lone Pine, February 28, 1894, Mrs. Josiah G. Dodge, aged about 53 years.

Bar silver, 60½.

See the various notices for proposals in this issue.

A. O. Collins will arrive at Independence this evening.

March came in like a lamb but the lion was close at his heels.

Wonder if Barnes will give his regular 17th of Ireland ball this year?

Suit for divorce has been instituted in the Superior Court by Isabella Scovil.

The political pot begins to simmer. A good lively boil may be expected soon.

A special meeting of Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M. will be held to-night.

Allie Shannon has "gone to be a sojer." At present he is stationed at Angel Island.

A. K. Briggs, formerly a merchant of Bishop, spent several days in town this week.

C. W. Craig arrived home last Monday from a visit to San Francisco and Southern California.

Independence is keeping up with the times, as the incendiary fire Wednesday night proves.

There is considerable horse talk about town which may culminate in a big race about July 4th.

Mrs. S. Williams of Big Pine arrived home last Monday from a visit of several weeks to the Big Fair.

Mrs. F. Rhine returned from San Francisco on Monday's train, where she has been on a visit for several weeks.

A good warm rain would be a boon to cattle men just now, as it would start the weeds and brush in the foothills.

Bart McGee, A. Schnoke and two others came down from Bishop early in the week with teams to go to work on the big canal.

Silver took a big drop last week, as low as 58 cents being quoted. The latest report, however, is a slight rise, the price being 60½.

Supervisor Uhlemeyer came down from Big Pine last Tuesday and spent a couple of days looking after the public highways of this section.

George W. White, head carpenter of the C. & O. R. R. visited Independence several days early in the week. His son, Jay White, is connected with the Index.

Wm. Arcularius intends starting for Mojave in a few days after a load of freight and will thereafter make regular trips. He has a fine team of twenty mules and will make quick trips. He offers to take pay in produce providing the advance charges to Mojave are paid in cash.

N. E. Conklin has entered the ranks of journalism as editor of the Kern City Standard, of which A. C. Maude, for many years editor of the Bakersfield Californian, is manager. The Standard is devoted to the interests of Kern City, formerly Sumner, especially and Kern county generally, and is a bright newsy journal.

A Dastardly Attempt.

A dastardly attempt was made by an incendiary Wednesday night to burn the residence of S. A. Densmore at Independence. About ten minutes past ten o'clock Mr. Densmore was awakened by an unusual noise and went down stairs to ascertain the cause. He found a pantry off the kitchen all in flames and was just in time to extinguish them and save the building. There is an outside cellar door on the premises through which ingress can be obtained to the house by means of a pair of stairs leading from the cellar to the kitchen; this door was left unlocked last night as usual. At the head of the cellar stairs within the house is a small landing, which is utilized as a pantry. At the head of the stairs is a small shelf where a can of kerosene is always kept. The contents of this can were poured over the pantry walls to such an extent that it ran out through the weather-boarding. A match was then touched to the inflammable mass and but for a most fortunate circumstance the dwelling would to-day be a mass of ruins, and probably life would have been lost, as Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Densmore occupy an inner room immediately over the place where the fire was started. On a ledge about five feet from the floor was a sack of prunes and beneath which were a number of tin cans; the fire burned the sack and the prunes fell upon the cans, making the noise which aroused Mr. Densmore. The deed must have been perpetrated by some person familiar with the premises as no noise was made either in entering or leaving the place, and a spaniel always left in the house, made no alarm and was outside in the morning. A Chinaman is now in the county jail suspected of the crime. A few days ago he was discharged from the employ of Mr. Densmore and a Chinaman of another Company hired. Near the back gate are the imprints of a China shoe, followed by barefooted tracks to the brush north of town, where the shoes were again put on and the tracks plainly discovered. The accused party has a bad reputation, having served a term in the State Prison at Carson. Should there not be sufficient evidence to connect him with this crime an effort will be made to get him out of the country under the law requiring the deportation of Chinese felons.

A Mammoth Enterprise.

We took occasion yesterday to visit the section of the big canal where Collins and Yaney are at work. They have three-fourths of a mile nearly completed, and a good idea of the magnitude of the enterprise can be obtained from the amount of work already done. The canal is being constructed on a scale that eclipses by far any yet constructed in the State, it being ninety feet between banks and ten feet deep. On this section there are nine four-horse Fresno scrapers at work with one big plough team, employing a force of about twenty men. On a measurement made Tuesday 20,000 yards of dirt had been removed in this place. Davies and and Jones have also done a large amount of work further north on contracts. The Collins contract is for three miles, and a portion of it has been sub-let to Bart, McGee and others from Bishop. The pushing of this work to a successful termination means an era of unprecedented prosperity for Owens Valley. A large amount of hay, grain and other produce will be consumed, and a ready market afforded for all kinds of farm produce. Mr. Stock is now on his way from New York to Los Angeles and will come here immediately on his arrival.

Obituary.

Mrs. Josiah G. Dodge died at Lone Pine on Wednesday evening of this week at seven o'clock. Her death was very sudden and unexpected. Mrs. Dodge was one of the pioneer women of Owens Valley and was widely known and highly respected, and her sudden death came as a shock to the community. She leaves a bereaved husband and seven grief-stricken children to mourn her loss. Her two married daughters, Mrs. C. H. Mates of Los Angeles and Mrs. Chas. Stewart of St. Louis were apprised of the sad news by telegraph. Rev. S. W. Albone of Independence went to Lone Pine yesterday to conduct the funeral services.

It is stated on good authority that T. R. Hofer, Superintendent of the United States Mint at Carson, has received notice from Washington that his resignation would be accepted. Ex-Governor Adams, Milt Elsner, Harry Day, J. C. Haggerman and John Wagner are mentioned as probable successors.

J. W. Symmes and others who have tried it claim that an acre of winter apple trees in bearing will yield a larger revenue than the same area of navel oranges. Owens Valley beats the world as an apple country.

A force of 500 horses with the men necessary to handle them means a market for a vast amount of produce. And that is what it will require to build the Mt. Whitney canal, now in course of construction.

The Standard Consolidated Mining Company of Bodie District has declared a dividend of ten cents per share, aggregating $10,000, and payable March 15 n.

A strong south wind began blowing last night and still continues; the indications are most favorable for a good rain.

AT THE BEACH.

The waves cream up on the shingle
In the sheen of the silver moon;
Faint flower scents float and mingle;
The winds in the pine tops croon.

A girl at her window sitting
Wafts from her finger tips
The kiss that a faroff lover
Never has had from her lips.

And the dew grows heavy with perfume;
The night owl hoots in his tree;
A sail gleams white in the darkness
Where the fisherman skims the sea.

Out on the long gray sedges
The beaded drops are pearled;
The robins dream in the hedges,
And angels are watching the world.

STEAMBOATING ON THE OHIO.

It Was at the Height of Its Prosperity Half a Century Ago.

It was from 1840 to 1855 that steamboating was at its height. Fortunes were made in those years by men who owned and ran boats. There were lots of steamers on the river then. The embryo industries of that period depended on the river entirely, for railroads had only been proposed—not built. About 100 steamboats were built at Pittsburg annually to run on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. This city was noted for the trim crafts it placed on the water, as some of the biggest and best running steamers were built at the headwaters of the Ohio.

The boats of the early steamboating days were all side wheelers. It was not until late that the advent of the stern wheel boats occurred, and when it did they were not looked upon with favor by the denizens of the side wheel crafts. The rivermen regarded them as an inferior kind of boat, on whose decks it was beneath the dignity of a first class steamboatman to tread.

The packets were of good size and stoutly built. They were not supplied with swinging stages and steam capstans, and their engines were of sure but not so graceful movement as engines now, and electric lights for steamboats were not even dreamed of. But they served their purpose in making big money for their owners.

There was but one organized packet company running boats down the river from Pittsburg. It was the old Pittsburg and Cincinnati Packet line, and it owned about 25 steamboats, some of which left the Pittsburg wharf daily. Among them were the Buckeye State, the Hibernia, Pittsburg, Crystal Palace and Pennsylvania. These boats were all stoutly built and especially adapted for fast running. The laws relating to racing were not so stringent then as now, and exciting contests of speed on the river occurred daily.

One of the swiftest of the packets was the Pennsylvania. She was the largest of the Cincinnati boats and made some splendid records on the Ohio. She was 210 feet long and 31 feet beam. Another fast steamer was the Alleghany. She was not so large as the Pennsylvania, but was almost as speedy. Some of these old Cincinnati Packet line boats were sunk, a few burned, and the others wore out in the river service.

Besides the Cincinnati company's packets there were several steamers, most of them owned by Pittsburgers, which ran down the river and which had no regular trades, but made trips whenever and wherever there was occasion for their services. They were chiefly to St. Louis and New Orleans, the trip to the last named point being completed in about 20 days. There were a few boats running up the Monongahela and Alleghany rivers. Brownsville was as far up as the slackwater improvements extended on the Monongahela, and Franklin was the head of navigation on the Alleghany. —Pittsburg Post.

A Dardistan Legend of a Bear.

Two women, a mother and her little daughter, were one night watching their field of Indian corn—"makai"—against the inroads of the bears. The mother had to go to her house to prepare the food and ordered her daughter to light a fire outside. While she was doing this a bear came and took her away. He carried her to his den and daily brought her to eat and drink. He rolled a big stone in front of the den whenever he went away on his tours, which the girl was not strong enough to move.

When she became old enough to do this, he used daily to lick her feet, by which they became swollen and gradually dwindled down to mere misshapen stumps. The girl eventually died, and the poor bear, after vain efforts to restore her to life, roamed disconsolately about the fields.—Dr. Leitner in Asiatic Quarterly.

LIEUTENANT LOUISA.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

"You suppose I brought you that potato to eat?" cried my aunt in undisguised astonishment. "It is a kidney potato, I tell you—a sovereign remedy against rheumatism! You are to keep it in your pocket, night and day." (I infer from this that my maidenly relative was under the impression that men slept in their trousers, and possibly that they were born in them.) "If you had only applied to me in time, you see, you would have been spared all this dreadful illness. But put it in your pocket. It will at all events secure you against the future."

And hereupon my aunt went into a long disquisition on the merits of the kidney potato from a medicinal point of view, and recapitulated innumerable cases of cures effected by it which had come under her own personal observation. At least I believe she talked about these things, but truth compels me to admit that I listened to as little of it as I could. Finally, however, I became aware that she had paused, and was searching in her reticule for something else. This time she produced a check book.

I now regarded her movements with a respectful interest which was no longer feigned. What a methodical woman she was, to be sure. I am convinced that nobody ever took so long a time to perform so simple a function as my Aunt Johanna took to write that check. She got her spectacles out of the case, rubbed them with her handkerchief, settled them and resettled them upon the lofty bridge of her aristocratic nose. Then she carefully opened the magic volume, in which indefinite wealth lay latent, and heedfully smoothed down the slender pink leaves. With suspicious scrutiny she selected a pen from among the bundle which I placed at her hand, slipped it cautiously in the ink bottle, squared herself at the table, with straight back and corrugated brow, and so began to trace the few but pregnant words that were to place me on even terms with the world.

As I sat watching this operation an idea suddenly occurred to me which changed my mood from pleased expectancy to ominous misgiving. What if Mary were to make her appearance now? It was of the last importance to the prosperity of my matrimonial projects that my aunt should receive a favorable impression of Mary at their first interview. And although Mary, considered in herself, was of course incapable of producing other than a good impression upon anybody, yet circumstances are potent things, and there was no denying that they would be against Mary were she to come into my room at this moment. With such an anxiety in my mind it is no wonder if I found my aunt's movements, even in writing me a check, altogether too deliberate to be agreeable. Moreover, what reason had I for supposing that, even after the check was written, my aunt would immediately depart? What more likely than that she would regard it as preparatory to a further session of indefinite length? It was not in nature to expect that an elderly lady would make a long journey and climb half a dozen flights of stairs merely for the sake of giving me a kidney potato and fifty pounds and then vanishing like a benevolent fairy. How imperturbably she sat in her chair! Surely no professional beauty ever "sat" with so much persistence and self complacency. I became so nervous that by the time she had actually finished the operation of writing the check and had torn it carefully out of the book and returned the book to her reticule I was feeling much more like bundling her incontinently out of the room than accepting her bounty with the gratitude which it rightfully demanded. It was precisely at this juncture that a brisk knock came at the door and the door was opened. I felt that I turned pale. But no—it was not Mary; it was the doctor. He was just the man for the occasion—quick witted, audacious and intrepid. My horizon cleared again. I saw my way.

I presented him to my aunt, whispered a word to him aside and he sat down. After exchanging a dozen general remarks he turned to me and exclaimed briskly:

"Now, my dear boy, are you ready?"

"Quite ready, doctor."

"Madam, I presume, has no objection?" continued the doctor, as he extracted an imposing looking case of instruments from his pocket.

"Eh?" said my aunt, settling her spectacles inquisitively.

"Only the examination," returned the doctor; "a mere nothing. Now, then, my boy, off with your shirt, quick!"

"Eh?" cried my aunt, jumping up in dismay. "His shirt?"

"Oh, the back and chest will, I think, be sufficient. If we need to look at the legs we can"——

"Gracious goodness!" gasped my aunt, reddening to the forehead, "let me go; show me the way out at once; I never could think of being present at—my dear Charles, why didn't you tell me? How could you suppose"——

"This way, aunt, this way," said I, with difficulty maintaining my gravity, while at the same time taking shame to myself for the ruse I was playing off on her. "A thousand thanks to you, dear aunt; it is most unfortunate that the interruption should have come at this time, but doctors, you know"——

"I understand, of course," she answered, pressing through the doorway and venturing to face me only when she was on the landing outside. "And I was going at any rate in a moment; and I only wanted to tell you, my dear nephew, that—that I am your aunt, and that I intend—that is, that you may expect—I mean that you need not fear—in short, it will be all right! And so, my dear, good-by and God bless you!" And with this the best of relatives kissed my unworthy cheek and hurried downstairs.

"Fine old lady, that!" observed the doctor, when I hobbled back to the room.

"The world does not contain her equal for her age!" I replied. "And now, my dear doctor, all I have to ask of you is to follow her example."

"What! write you a check for fifty pounds!" exclaimed he. "Not me!"

"I expect nothing so sensible of you. What I want is to be left alone. Solitude is to be my medicine for this afternoon."

"Ah!" ejaculated the doctor, smiling with an arch twinkle in his eye. "Well, I'm off; but, mind you, no more aunts of any age or I'll order you mustard plasters and tartar emetic!" And with this threat and a laugh he took his leave.

"And now," said I to myself, sinking back in my chair, "of course Mary won't come after all."

I must confess that I wished my Aunt Johanna at Nice, or even in some warmer climate, and my welcome of her (when I had realized the situation) was as unenthusiastic as if she had been a pressing dun or a defaulting washerwoman. Nevertheless my aunt turned up trumps—turned up, in fact, what is styled a "regular fistful." Her address and behavior were tender and even caressing to a degree that I had never expected from her; she had compassion for my past miseries and sympathy for my present condition; she gently upbraided me for having kept her so long in ignorance of my misfortunes; she declared that I ought to have some one who belonged to me to look after me; and in short she showed herself in a light so different from that in which I had heretofore regarded her that I took shame to myself for the hard thoughts that I had sometimes harbored against her.

"And now, my dear Charles," said this excellent woman, after about half an hour's conversation, sitting up and feeling in her pocket, "and now I have brought you one or two things which I am sure will do you good. Dear me! where is it? Oh, in my reticule, of course! No, don't get up, Charles—I prefer to get it myself. There! What do you think of that?"

"It looks like a—like a raw potato," I said, after examining the object which she smilingly handed me.

"A kidney potato—yes; and I am certain it is one of the right sort, for I got it out of my own garden. I got it especially for you!"

"That was very good of you, aunt," I replied, in as cordial a tone as my surprise would permit me to assume. "Is it to be roasted, or am I to eat it boiled?"

"Eat it! Good gracious, Charles, do

A NEW VERSION OF AN OLD HYMN

When the last faint ray has shone,
Matthew, Mark and Luke and John,
Bless the bed I rest upon.

Pray that sins with work may cease,
Grace this kindly time increase,
Pray, Evangelists of Peace.

Music of your spell suggest
Thoughts to linger in my breast,
Till they charm my heart to rest.

Jesu's Face, which love can find
Fair in Holy Writ enshrined,
Light the vision of my mind.

So shall I not sleep in death
Though your true Evangel saith
I must breathe my final breath.

Then wrapped in my winding sheet
Prayers for me once more repeat,
Holy Four at head and feet.

Bid my soul a glad release,
Bid her rest that shall not cease,
Lovely Messengers of Peace.

Hopelessly Dull.

A lawyer in this city who has been courting a pretty Louisville girl for a long time has always lacked sufficient nerve to propose. The girl has helped him along as much as she could, but the proposal still hangs fire, and it looks as if he would have to resort to the Miles Standish style of courtship unless he does better. Even a hint as broad as the Mississippi has no perceptible effect upon him, as the following incident will show: The other day she asked him if the law was a difficult profession to learn. He told her it was not, at least he has not found it so, and she playfully remarked that she would like to begin reading law at once.

"Will you lend me some of your textbooks?" she inquired. Of course he was only too willing to oblige her, and when he asked what volumes she would want first she looked at him, smiled archly and answered that she believed she preferred "The Law on Partnerships" and "Sheldon's Law on Marriage." Any fellow who failed to catch on to this should be sent to a Trappist monastery. He is simply hopeless.—Louisville Times.

WHEN WAR IS DECLARED

Against a man's happiness by his stomach, the enemy may be pacified and brought speedily and easily to terms. That potent regulator of digestion, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, disciplines the rebellious organ thoroughly. Indigestion arises from weakness of the stomach and the food in it, for want of the power to digest, decomposes and acidifies, giving rise to heartburn, flatulence and pain, besides a multitude of symptoms both changeful and perplexing. But peace soon reigns when the great stomachic is resorted to and used with persistence. Dyspepsia gives rise to morbid discomposure of mind, and even sleeplessness and hypochondria in chronic cases. To the complete dismissal of these the Bitters is fully adequate. Liver complaint, constipation, debility, rheumatism and malaria are completely subdued by this genial medicine.

Many a man whose prayers were long will be kept out of heaven because his yardstick was too short.

SHREWD BARNEY BIGLIN.

It Was Politics For Him Not to Know Ex-Judge Dittenhoefer.

Most of the stories worth printing about the famous Chicago convention of 1880 have been published, but here is one that seems to be new: Ex-Judge Dittenhoefer was in Chicago working against Grant and a third term. Bernard Biglin was there in the interest of Grant. Both were old personal friends. The night before the balloting began Biglin and two others were appointed a committee to look after several southern delegations, among them being the Kentucky delegation.

When Biglin and his associates arrived at the Kentucky headquarters, they found that Dittenhoefer had got ahead of them. He had the floor and was delivering a strong speech against Grant, saying, among other things, that Grant could not carry New York. Biglin saw that Dittenhoefer's remarks were having great weight, and he realized that he was no match for him as a talker. What to do to break the force of Dittenhoefer's speech was the problem that confronted Biglin. This was the method he selected. In the midst of Dittenhoefer's peroration Biglin called out in loud voice, "Who is that man?"

"Why, he is ex-Judge Dittenhoefer of New York," said a member of the Kentucky delegation.

"Oh, no; that's not Judge Dittenhoefer," said Biglin. "I know Judge Dittenhoefer well. This man may pretend to be Dittenhoefer to strangers, but he knows better than to try to work any such racket with New Yorkers. I tell you he's a fraud."

Biglin's remarks made a sensation. Suspicious glances were cast at Dittenhoefer by members of the Kentucky delegation. The former got red in the face and walked up to Biglin. "Barney," he said, holding out his hand, "that's a pretty good joke of yours, not to know me."

"Joke," shouted Biglin in contempt. "It's no joke, I can tell you. I will just bet you $20 that you are not Judge Dittenhoefer of New York." Biglin flourished a $20 bill in Dittenhoefer's face. Of course he had to accept the challenge. The money was put up in the hands of a member of the delegation. Dittenhoefer hurried away to get some one to identify him. When he returned, Biglin had disappeared, likewise the stakeholder. After the convention Dittenhoefer met Biglin in the hotel corridor. "What did you mean," he said, "by saying you did not know me that night at the Kentucky headquarters?"

"What did you mean," said Biglin, "by saying that Grant could not carry New York?"

"That was politics," answered Dittenhoefer.

"Well," said Biglin, "it was politics my not knowing you."

Dittenhoefer and Biglin are still friends.—New York Press.

What He Helped At.

The congressman was telling stories.

"It was on me once," he said. "I had a friend who was dry as a humorist, but not always dry as a drinker, and when he was full he did foolish things. One of these was to buy a jackass for $500, and when he sobered up and knew what he had done he sold him back to the original seller for $100. Naturally the loss of $100 made him sore, and he did not like to be twitted about it. One day I saw him on a mule waiting in front of a store, and I spoke to him. He was just full enough to be serious.

"'Hello,' I said, and he responded with a nod.

"'You are a judge of that sort of animal you are riding, aren't you?'

"'I don't know that I am particularly so,' he said earnestly.

"'I thought you were in the business.'

"'No, I ain't."

"'Didn't you buy a jack for $500 not long ago?'

"The crowd that had gathered giggled, and he looked more serious than ever.

"'Yes I did,' he answered solemnly.

"'What did you do with him?' I asked, with a wink at the crowd to be ready.

"He looked at me solemnly.

"'I helped elect him to congress,' he said, without a smile, and the howl that went up made me seek shelter in the nearest place that could be found."—Detroit Free Press.

Human Imitations of Vegetables.

Referring to the fact that the human head is sometimes facetiously and irreverently spoken of as "a cocoanut," the Boston Transcript remarks that scientists have recently discovered a remarkable resemblance between the shell of the fruit and the shell of the human brain. Then it quotes a French scientific periodical to prove that there is a wonderful likeness between other human organs and vegetable products. For example, the meat of the English walnut is a close copy of the form and convolutions of the brain; plums and cherries are like the eye; almonds are shaped like the nose; the ear is brought to mind by an opened oyster and shell; in a mammoth squash the entire body may be traced; the open hand is found in growing scrub willow and celery, and the heart is seen in the German turnip and the eggplant.

The Katydid's Song.

Everybody is familiar with the music of the katydid. It is the male that has the voice. At the base of each wing cover is a thin membraneous plate. He elevates the wing covers and rubs the two plates together. If you could rub your shoulder blades together, you could imitate the operation very nicely.—Washington Star.

Long Winded.

"How full he is of his subject!" said one of the hearers.

"Yes, but how slow he is in emptying himself!" was the reply.—Intransigeant Illustre.

LONDON AT NIGHT

Saturday Evening Street Scenes in the City of the Dockers.

MUSIC, DANCES AND CATCHY SONGS.

A Break in the Fearful Dreariness That Marks the Hard Life of the Toiling Thousands.

The memory of a Saturday night in the City of the Dockers is like the recollection of a troubled dream, for on this last night of the week the great, hot streets are filled with the pentup life of 500,000 houses (one cannot call them homes), and all the varied phases of this hand to hand struggle for existence appear. The docker is prodigal of his few shillings on Saturday night, the maximum of his liberality being shown most often in the public house and on the catch penny street conjurer, while the minimum is apparent at the stalls of the grocer and butcher. But men, women and children are out on the streets, and, whatever else it be, Saturday night is something of a break in the fearful dreariness that marks the life of the east London toiling thousands.

The people love music. Their interpretation of music is rather rough and loud. The bass drum of every band that parades in a labor demonstration of a Sunday gets terribly punished before the day is over, but it commands a great following, and on Saturday night the street musicians and singers easily gather their crowds and reap an abundant harvest. The barrel organ is found everywhere, and wherever it is rattling out the popular "Daisy" or "The Man Who Broke the Bank at Monte Carlo" the sidewalks will be crowded, while two or three couples of little girls dance on the flagstones.

Nearly every girl of 8 can dance, many of them have already appeared in public at the cheap concert halls, and as one watches them, hatless, dirty, but with faces beaming with delight, he does not know whether to be glad of their joy or to pity their hollow present and hopeless future the more. Often a part in these street dances will be taken by the older girls, factory girls, as they are all called in east London, who are out in crowds on Saturday night. They are an untamed, fantastic lot. All wear enormous hats, adorned with feathers, and train their hair about the forehead by curling it forward quite fiercely. They are intensely loyal to the customs and traditions of their own "set," and forced as they are to subsist on an income of 6 to 8 shillings per week they are a vexing problem to the east London philanthropist and reformer.

Besides the barrel organs, there are violins, accordions and any number of soloists unaccompanied by an instrument. Blind women, old men and the poor wrecks of this awful struggle for existence here stand at the curbstone and in weak, thin voices sing their songs. The restless crowd moves on, save when some one more curious or more kindly than the rest stands near to look or listen. A bent woman, whose thin shawl was thrown over her shoulders, was feebly singing some old song in the midst of the jostling throng around a public house. I saw a strong young girl of 14 come kindly toward her, drop a penny in the little box held by the feeble hand and then hurry away out of sight. Happy will the strong young lass be if the swirl of the turbid stream of east London life does not bring her some time to the place of the curbstone singer. Indeed there is no place that I have ever seen where mirth and pathos, vice and virtue, meet and mingle as on these streets in a night like this.

One sees very little begging. There is not much street begging anyway—there's no use begging; the people are too poor. The mendicant flees Canning town for the wealthier residential quarters. Of course the children beset one. The sidewalk artist is sometimes found, but the most common form of appeal is from the ragged little fellows who turn handsprings or stand on their heads for you. They really do their athletics very nicely, and there is something so appealing and "old mannish" in their looks that it is hard to resist them. I was hurrying through the crowds in Victoria docks one night about 10 when a boy of 7 came out and ran beside me, relating some sort of verse, I thought. Three repetitions made it clear:

Ha'p'ny won't 'wit yer,
Penny won't break yer,
Tu'p'nce won't send yer t' the work'us.

He was evidently working on a "graduated scale of benevolence adapted to the abilities of the donor." I believe by the emphasis laid on the last item that he estimated me from my gold bowed spectacles at tu'pence.

The barrows of east London delicacies abound in the streets where marketing goes on. The woman who sells cold pickled pigs' feet is in fair demand. The man who retails shrimps at a penny a bag gets a good trade, but the couple who preside at the barrow filled with "cockles and winkles" have their hands full. The delectable mollusks are displayed on little dishes as large as "individual butters," with a bit of garnishing of parsley, and are eaten with vinegar on the spot.

These barrows are found especially at the entrance of Victoria Docks road, a great marketing place in Canning town on Saturday night. Clothing (very cheap and shoddy and called "slops"), little tools for household use, cheap laces, filberts, "red bandanna" handkerchiefs and horn combs are some of the many articles sold from barrows in the street, outside the regular shops for meat, fruit and fish. On the whole, trade is carried on with great briskness, but more quietly than in market streets at home. The butchers are the most noisy. They delight in wearing tall hats and screaming odd calls at the full of their lungs. A penny is the standard unit here in Canning town. The buyers are poor, and everything that can be called at a penny is. A common cry is:

A penny a pun, a pun a penny,

at the barrows, where a pound of anything can be sold at this low rate.—Hartford Courant.

Fewer Colored People in New England.

The colored race does not increase rapidly in New England. Rhode Island is the only one of the New England states where the colored people were, in 1890, over 2 per cent. of the population. Even there the colored population has, according to the census, fallen off from 2.49 per cent. of the population in 1850 to 2.21 per cent. in 1890. In Connecticut, in the same period, the percentage declined from 2.07 to 1.72. In Maine the colored population in 1890 was less than a quarter of 1 per cent., a decline for the decade, but a slight, scarcely perceptible gain as compared with 1850. The same is true of New Hampshire and Vermont, where colored people make up only 0.18 per cent. and 0.30 per cent., respectively, of the population.

In Massachusetts they were in 1890 1.05 per cent. of the population, against 0.91 in 1850. In Massachusetts, as in all other New England states, however, their percentage declined during the preceding decade. The census enumerators found 23,570 colored people in Massachusetts in 1890, 1,823 in Maine, 690 in New Hampshire, 1,004 in Vermont, 7,647 in Rhode Island, and 12,820 in Connecticut. There is no indication of the forcing of the color line in New England politics in these figures, but there is, on the other hand, the suggestion of a physically decadent race, or at least one that is not holding its own in its social isolation.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

He Had Done What He Could.

A short time ago, in New York city, a pupil of the Grammar school, No. 87, Freddy Peck by name, died of a sudden malady. He was but twelve years old, and had done nothing to make himself famous, surely, at so early an age, but the little story which his death brought out has spread his name far and wide.

More than a year ago, when he was barely eleven, Freddy Peck formed a plan to establish a library for the grammar school to which he belonged. He was aware that the most important part of any such labor is a beginning, and this he made by saving up all the money which was given him and starting a bank account for the benefit of the library.

When the last Christmas season came Freddy announced that he wished that all the money which was likely to be spent for him should go to the library deposit in the bank. Perhaps this announcement stimulated giving on the part of his friends; at any rate, with these special gifts and Freddy's savings for more than a year, the sum of $314 had been obtained.—Youth's Companion.

Beans in Leap Year.

A curious belief about leap year is perhaps not so well known as the ladies' privilege. Rustic folk in many parts of England firmly believe that in leap year all kinds of beans are produced in the pods in the reverse position to that which is usual, or, as an old laborer in Surrey once phrased it, "In leap year the eye is to the point, in other years to the strig," that is, the stalk. There is ample evidence that in the last bissextile, 1888, in many widely separated parts of the country, the beans were observed to be produced in the pods in this manner, and the rustic belief that this was caused by the fact of its being leap year was naturally strengthened.

But by some agriculturists the phenomenon was taken to be a sign of plenty, and there is no doubt that beans grow in this manner in other years than the bissextile, but whenever the occurrence happens to coincide with the latter the superstition is sure to revive.—Yankee Blade.

The King of Siam Starts a Railroad.

The king of Siam recently cut the first turf for the new railroad at Bangkok. The minister of public works read a short address, to which the king replied, and then the king, taking an ivory handled spade, thrust the silver blade into the turf, which he transferred to an ebony wheelbarrow. The crown prince trundled the wheelbarrow along a carpeted track about thirty yards in length, followed by the king, the royal family and the assembled guests. The turf, when removed from the ebony wheelbarrow, was sprinkled with consecrated water from a golden ewer by four priests. The national anthem was played, and that ended the ceremony.

Vacation Exercise.

The swirl of the stream and the bobolink's golden cascade of song will drive the eternal jingle of the dollar from your ear. The feel of a good rod is better for your clinching hand than is the sordid touch of a greasy note, and the thrill that shakes your failing nerves when the game fish makes his first wild rush is better for your soul and body than is the jarring shock men too often feel when the "ticker" rattles its poisoned bones and vomits forth its fateful tape before paling faces and straining eyes.—Ed W. Sandys in Outing.

A Singular Bequest.

Some time ago, Mr. Hoppe, a professor at the University of Basle, left at his death to a scientific society the whole of his fortune, amounting to half a million francs, to be laid out in prizes for the research of the human soul. The heirs presumptive protested, as was natural, against so absurd a bequest, and threatened the society with an action at law. The latter saw that they stood a poor chance of winning the day and disgorged.—Le Temps.

CIDER MAKING.

How the Business of Securing Apple Juice is Conducted Nowadays.

ONLY GOOD APPLES ARE USED.

Great Care is Taken in the Modern Process to Have the Product Clean, Pure and Wholesome.

There is a willow shaded mill pond in the rolling country on the north shore of Long Island where boys go after school to angle for catfish and sunnies. Hills covered with orchards slope down to its edges on three sides, and on the fourth the water which tumbles over the dam runs northward through a deep ravine grown with scrub birch. From a seat on the dam the angler looks down on the roof of an old one story mill with moss grown shingles, and on a large overshot water wheel which creaks as it turns. Small mountain ranges of apples are heaped on a level beside the mill and down the winding road comes a two horse wagon loaded with russets. Such at least is the scene in September, when the apple harvest is pressed into cider. It is further enlivened by the country boys, who scoop up the fresh juice in their hollowed hands as it runs through the trough from press shed to storage house.

Such mills can still be found in this and neighboring states, but they are not nearly so common as they were twenty years ago. The production of cider has increased enormously since then, but modern methods and machinery have robbed the cider mill of much of its picturesqueness. These days you can buy refined and sparkling cider over the bar, or have it served at the tables of the best city hotels. It is no longer identified with the country, but there are few men who do not, whenever they happen to put the glass to their lips, catch with the aroma a vivid picture of willow skirted mill ponds rushing raceways and autumn foliage.

The development of the modern cider mill has been accomplished rapidly, and is due to the superiority of the New York product and the demand which it has created. Cider making is no longer one of the incidents of farm life. The farmer no longer puts together a rough grinding and pressing apparatus and hitches to it his treadmill in order to produce each autumn juice enough for the family drinking and the family vinegar. Cider making is now a great industry. Capital has entered the field. Large establishments have sprung up all over the state, each capable of dealing with many thousands of bushels of apples every fall. Labor saving machinery has been devised. Steam power has supplanted the water wheel. Millions of dollars have been invested upon which cider is earning interest and handsome profits.

When the New York farmer nowadays gathers his apples he first sorts out the prime fruit for the market. This he sends into many states. Thousands of barrels go to South America, for the apple is there esteemed a greater luxury than the banana, the orange and the guava. The rest of his crop the farmer sends to the cider mill, but this necessitates another sorting, for the best manufacturers require a certain standard of fruit for the manufacture of their high grades of cider. The unripe and stunted fruit is devoted to vinegar. The apples go to the nearest mill in great two horse wagons, and are there dumped into storage buildings, where they are measured and inspected. The mill owner pays the farmer a price which varies with the quality and the condition of his fruit. Condition is now regarded as an important consideration. In the old days the juice of decayed fruit was thought as good as any. Now such fruit is refused or thrown away. This is another reason why mills of great size and high power are required, that the enormous quantities of apples received within a period of a few weeks may be disposed of without delay and consequent rotting.

The process of cider making has not changed. The fruit is ground and pressed just as it used to be, except for the use of improved machinery. The mash or pumice is not pressed dry any longer, however. It is only pressed so long as the sweetest juice runs and before there is any danger of mashing the seeds and adding their flavor to the delicate cider. Later on this pumice is pressed again and the juice run into other receptacles for the making of vinegar. Each bushel of apples is expected to produce about three gallons of cider and one of vinegar.

Where the great improvement in manufacture lies is in the treatment of the juice. The muddy cider of the old time mills and the farmhouse fireside is a thing of the past. Our cider now is as clear as amber, and when fermentation has done its work foams and sparkles as delectably as the finest champagne. The most sentimental will have to admit that the beverage possesses a delicacy of flavor and a bouquet which has no counterpart in his rose tinted recollections of boyhood. Many experiments in refining the raw juice have resulted in the universal adoption of refining sand. Through this the juice is passed as through a filter, and comes out clear as crystal and tinted like sunshine.

It was once popularly supposed that cider could not be kept "sweet," or unfermented, without the introduction of some adulterant. It was at one time widely published that blood from the slaughter houses would accomplish this result, and was so used by manufacturers, and this fact interfered for awhile with the spread of cider drinking. As a fact, cider is kept sweet for an indefinite period, and that merely by sealing the fresh juice. Apple juice contains sugar and becomes "hard" only when this sugar changes into alcohol. But it requires the action of the air to accomplish this change, and when cider is bottled sweet it will remain so. Perfectly pure sweet cider can always be bought.

A sweet cider carbonated so that it foams like champagne, but absolutely non-intoxicating, has long been on the market and is one of the most famous brands. Champagne cider, so called, is nothing but refined "hard" cider. It is not true that spirits of any sort are added to make champagne cider. The sweet juice is simply allowed to stand until the sugar changes to alcohol, of which about 3 per cent. is usually developed. Then it is bottled. Some famous champagne ciders contain a little carbonic acid gas. Others are bottled without.—New York Sun.

Fish Hooks Very Old.

We learn from Hawker's edition of "The Compleat Angler" that eyed hooks, commonly supposed to be one of the discoveries of yesterday, were in use nearly 200 years ago, and "artificial flies dressed with the wings of natural insects" are a return to the times when anglers impaled real flies on bare hooks.—National Review.

GIVE US MEN OF BRAINS.

Yea, give us brains behind the plow,
Behind the counter's hem;
Set on the manufacturer's brow
Like royal diadem—
Yea, give us men of brains!

Of finer sense, of larger thought,
Wherever manhood reigns—
By all the pow'rs of learning fraught
In might its kingship trains,
Yea, give us men of brains!

For they survive when empires fade,
When naught but dust remains;
To tell of lordly acolade
On time's incipient gains,
Yea, give us men of brains!

Brains, for the mind, brains for the mart,
Brains for the home and hall;
In consecration set apart
For princely coronal!
Yea, give us men of brains!

THE SOCIETY GIRL DURING LENT.

How the Gay Young Thing Manages to Occupy Herself Without Dancing.

The amount of rest and refreshment the average girl gets this Lent is a minus quantity. She works harder than she has done all the winter, and that, all scoffers to the contrary, is harder than any servant in her parents' house. The Lenten girl is of two orders—the deeply religious and the fashionably devotional. The first one carries in her pocketbook a tiny lavender card with purple crosses and stars all over it, and bearing a list of services in her favorite church. On no day are there less than two; she sings at one of them, and stays after the other to practice Gregorian chants for the next day. She attends a Dorcas society every Saturday and takes home six garments to make in the course of the week, and she makes them herself, too, faithfully and laboriously.

She spends an hour in devotional reading and two poring over history or biography every day. She attends a Shakespeare class twice a week and goes as often to hear some well read woman elucidate state and national politics to a party of girls. No one stays to lunch after these mornings; that would be frivolous, and besides there is just time to run into the dressmaker's to have a fitting before afternoon service. The dressmaker provides a cup of tea and a biscuit, and after eating this very substantial meal the girl walks to church and puts her car fare in the poor box. Then she visits a worthy widow away over on the East side, carries her relief and promises of work and comes home to spend an hour in hysterical crying over the misery she saw.

She only receives her men friends one evening a week, and then converses gravely and sedately, clad in a dove colored gown turned in a mite at the throat, with tulle folded around it. She does not accept candy or flowers, and always gets up an hour before breakfast, dragging her reluctant younger brothers and sisters out of bed so that she may help them in their lessons, which she does after an entirely different method from that employed by their governess, and consequently bewilders the poor little mortals more than she helps them. She goes regularly to the Turkish bath and the manicure, the Delsarte class and the riding school. She teaches in a mission sewing class and a charity kindergarten. Then there are rehearsals for private theatricals and for the weddings at which she is to be bridesmaid in Easter week. The gloves and shoes she will wear are to be made of a peculiar style and color, which necessitates one or two trips way over to a little manufacturer on the west side, where she gets her sympathy aroused over an abandoned baby, and spends a week and all her dress money getting it into a home.

Of course she has to go to lectures and a matinee now and then or she would die. The fashionably devotional girl does nearly all these things, only she walks on Fifth avenue in a black gown and a severe hat, carrying a prayer book and wearing a bunch of violets. She goes out of town after service Friday and stays over Saturday with a married friend in the country, where high revel is held with the aid of sleighing parties and banjos till the last train Saturday night. Brother Tom meets her at the station and tells her that his friend Harry and her friend Lou are cooking oysters in a chafing dish at Lou's house. But she is at early service on Sunday.

After three weeks of this she goes south and has a lovely time, for Lent is not kept when one is away from home, and besides it would be an extravagance not to wear all her evening gowns once or twice more before letting them go. But with all the frivolity and girlish hypocrisy of it there is a lot of good earnest work done by the society girl in Lent. She helps others and herself to better things, and everything counts, even if it is only showing Cousin Fred how womanly and sweet she looks in the little gray gown with her hands full of plain sewing.—New York Press.

Plain Words Respecting Servants.

You hire ignorant women, of low conceptions, giving them the price ignorance and stupidity are worth. You are astonished when you do not get ideas and feelings of which these women know nothing. When they do rise higher they are no longer willing to work for you in the same capacity.

We all get precisely what we give. If we are stingy in giving, be assured the stinginess will gain us nothing. We pay money for work, pound for pound. If we want human feeling besides, we can only get it by giving it ourselves.

If we want thoughtfulness for our interests from our servants, we must be thoughtful for their interests. If we want their sympathy in our need, we must give it to them in their need. If we want allowance made for faults and failings, we must offer them that. We may have to explain to them what we are doing and why; because such women seldom perceive the reason themselves. These women have often to be treated like children. Motives have to be explained to them.

There are a few women, of course, who could not be managed this way, but there are very few. I have rarely seen a servant with whom, when I met her on the ground of like feelings, I could not do just as I pleased.—Harper's Bazar.

ENORMOUS FEES.

Large Incomes Enjoyed by Prominent Doctors and Lawyers.

HOW THE COMMON HERD FARES.

Remuneration Graduated According to the Public Appreciation of Their Skill and Talent.

An English journalist visiting this country a few years ago said of New York that it was "a market where all desirable wares are certain to bring a fair reward for the trouble and expense of producing them." While this is as true today as it was then, there are critics who find fault with the scale of prices and give point to the old saying that it is impossible to satisfy everybody.

A reporter has investigated the subject of professional incomes received in this city, and in the course of this investigation has discovered that, if the figures cited by President Harper are accurate, his college professors are doing quite as well as the average lawyer, doctor and clergyman in New York. He states that in 61 colleges having from 60 to 250 students, the salaries of the most highly paid professors average about $1,900, and that in colleges having more than 250 students the average is $1,916.

The average business man who makes 8 per cent on his invested capital thinks that he is getting a very fair return for it. The capital of the professional man is his education, so that President Harper's professor receives an income about equivalent to that derived from $25,000 invested at 8 per cent. Many doctors and lawyers have confessed to the reporter that they would be glad to feel sure of realizing that profit as the result of a year's labor.

During the last 30 or 40 years the rate of compensation for the heaviest cases of work in the three learned professions has greatly increased. Before the war the lawyer who received a fee of $2,000, $3,000 or $5,000 was regarded as a specially lucky fellow. To-day it is a common thing for well known members of the bar to charge and obtain such sums for a particular service.

During the famous Erie litigation, brought about by the transactions of Fisk and Gould, David Dudley Field, their counsel, is said to have received a retainer of $100,000. At no time during the period when that eminent jurisconsult was at the summit of his fame and in the midst of an active practice did he derive less than $100,000 per annum from his professional labors. Mr. Evarts' income was quite as large, and Mr. Choate, his partner, is today in receipt of one that cannot be much less. While these cases are exceptional, there are, it is estimated, between 300 and 400 lawyers here whose average annual earnings will exceed $10,000.

Against these, which may be classified as cases of lawyers of exceptional talents and opportunities, are to be placed the cases of the thousands of less fortunate ones, many of whom barely manage to earn a support for themselves and their families. The law is a crowded profession, and for the man who enters it without briefs or friends an unprofitable one. According to an estimate given the reporter by a member in long practice, the average income of the New York lawyer is between $900 and $1,000.

The same conditions are to be observed in the medical profession. There, too, men of the highest attainments and reputation are earning yearly sums that half a century ago would have been regarded as a fortune. A list submitted to the reporter of physicians whose incomes exceed $20,000 contained, among others, such names as Dr. Loomis, Dr. Flint, Dr. Sayre, Dr. Satterlee, Dr. Stimson, Dr. Markoe, Dr. Peters, Dr. McBurney, Dr. Hamilton, Dr. Delafield and Dr. Weir. The list of those whose incomes are in the neighborhood of $10,000 embraces the names of nearly 200 practitioners.

Doctors like Loomis, Flint and Sayre hold the same relation to the practice of medicine that lawyers like Choate, Evarts, Carter and Field hold to the practice of law. They are the "major gods" of their profession, and their remuneration is graduated according to the public appreciation of their pre-eminent skill and talent. A physician who has been associated with Dr. Loomis in many important cases is of the opinion that his profession yields him as much as $60,000 or $70,000 a year. In former times, when a doctor had more business than he could attend to, he turned some of it over to an assistant. Although that is still done, the most popular of the leading physicians correct the excess by increasing their charges or by adopting the role of consulting physicians.

A quarter of a century back $2.50 was the usual fee for a visit. Now it is in some instances $5, in other $10 and in still other $20. When a physician who has abandoned the practice of visiting his patients and become a consulting physician makes an exception under special circumstances, he charges for a visit thus made as much as he would for a consultation. Doctors of the grade of Sayre, Stimson, Flint, Loomis and McBurney, when acting as consulting physicians, receive as high as $50, $75 and $100.

In the third or lowest grade of the profession the incomes taper down from $3,000 to a few hundreds. This of course is the most numerous grade and has the principle of the survival of the fittest as illustrated by experiences that are often positively harrowing. At the time when the passion for painting placques was most intensely developed in this city, a cynic observed that, "Of placques and doctors there is no end." He alluded to the multitude of "sawbones" yearly graduated in spite of the fact that New York has had for years more doctors than it knows what to do with. By the profession the opinion is almost unanimously entertained that the best correction of the evil is to raise the standard of qualification. Reduce the quantity and improve the quality of the supply.—New York News.

Woman's Last Look.

"When a woman has got her bonnet and gloves on and is perfectly ready, with her parasol in hand, she always goes back," says a cynical person, "to a mirror to take a last, fond farewell. Every woman does this, but few are honest enough to confess it. "For my part," continues this frank as well as cynical individual, "I don't mind telling you that I myself am not satisfied with one last look. I invariably take four. The second is for my brother or—or some other young man—that's nothing but just. The third is for my friends—that's only generous—and the last is for the woman I don't like, and who doesn't like me—that's human nature. If the fourth satisfies me, then I assure you I never take any more."—London Tit-Bits.

A Chilly Affair.

"Mr. Simpkins-Harold," she said, with faltering coyness, while he gave a sudden start of terror as the thought that this is the year 1892 flashed upon him, "I am the bearer of a message from my father. He says that you must come here no longer without stating your intentions. And, Harold, you know this is leap year, and—and, oh, need I say more?"

"Miss Boggs," replied the young man, recovering his self possession and his hat, "am I to understand that your father charged you to deliver to me an ultimatum?"

"Why, yes, Harold, if you will use those newspaper terms at such a moment."

"Say to him, then," said the young man, "that his representative is persona non grata to me, and that I firmly but respectfully decline to continue diplomatic relations."

In a moment he was gone. But the young girl did not falter. "Persona non grata, am I?" she mused. "That might have done a week or two ago, but it has been shown that when really serious complications have arisen that plea doesn't go. And I just reckon, Harold Simpkins," she continued aloud, as a rosy flush mantled her plump cheek, "that I've got a little batch of diplomatic correspondence which, when read before any court of breach of promise arbitration in the country, will bring me in a good big indemnity too."—Chicago Times.

A Japanese Society.

There are so many English people who have visited Japan or who have fallen in love with it from reading the eulogies penned by Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Norman and others, that the society which is in course of formation for "the encouragement of the study of Japanese art, science and industries, of the commerce and finance, the social life, the literature, the language, history and folklore of the Japanese," ought to be a success. Certainly the programme does not lack comprehensiveness, for almost any one of the subjects enumerated would be sufficient to keep an ordinary society going.

The organizing council contains several names closely associated with the country, such as Mr. Ernest Satow, Professor W. Anderson and Professor Church, as well as those of leading Japanese residents in England. Very suitably, the headquarters of the society are to be at the Japanese consulates in London, Liverpool and Glasgow, for no people are more anxious to spread a knowledge of Japan abroad than the Japanese government.—London Chronicle.

A Bad Place to Be Ill.

It is one thing to have the grip in town or anywhere on the mainland within reach of a doctor, and another think to be stricken with the disease on a remote isle of the sea. On a Thursday morning recently the inhabitants of Grand Manan, a large, well populated island off the Maine coast, observed a single fire—the sick signal—burning on Three Isles, six miles seaward, but as a gale was blowing and the sea running high nobody could land there. On Sunday evening a physician, accompanied by three sturdy oarsmen in a dory, reached the isles in a blinding snowstorm. Fifteen of the sixteen inhabitants were sick abed, leaving one man barely able to crawl to the headland and keep the signal burning. It was three days before weather moderated sufficiently to allow the relief party to return home, and in that time the sick were relieved.—New York Sun.

Lightning Spared the Pious Pair.

During a heavy rain lightning struck the parsonage of the Methodist Episcopal church, a nice four room cottage, completely demolishing the building with the exception of the east room, in which were sitting the pastor, the Rev. Jerome Haralson, and his wife. That they were not instantly killed everybody pronounces a miracle, for everything in their room all around them was broken in small pieces. A more complete wreck was never seen. There is not a whole nail or piece of timber in the building except in the little room they occupied. Not only the building was wrecked, but the fence around it was torn down. The shock broke a considerable amount of crockery for those living in the neighborhood of the parsonage.—Haskell Cor. Galveston News.

The Dog Didn't Like His Snore.

In hunting for evidence of a dog fight Sunday the officers learned that one Herbert Sprague, a stevedore, had been bitten by a canine. Investigation shows that Sprague went to bed Saturday night with a bull pup. Sprague snored, and this disturbed the dog, so he scratched his owner's face to wake him. Sprague retaliated by cuffing the canine, whereupon the bull fastened his teeth in the man's nose and then shook him, sadly lacerating the member. Sprague finally broke the hold, disabled the dog with a chair and then got a neighbor to shoot him. The nose will recover, but looks bad.—Bangor Cor. Lewiston Journal.

The Congressional Funeral.

On the recent congressional trip to Chicago from Washington, a young man accustomed to hilarity began to weary of the staid decorum of the excursionists and to long for something wild and woolly.

"Great Scott," he finally exclaimed to a veteran member, "this is like a funeral train."

"Is it?" said the congressman, with a significant smile; "well, I guess you don't know much about one of our funeral trains."—Detroit Free Press.

How Banks Treat "Sweated" Coins.

In a recent deposit in the United States subtreasury in this city by a New York bank of more than $100,000 in gold received from California seven "sweated" coins were found. They were placed on a block and the letter L punched on their face to show that they were light weight and then returned to the bank.—New York Herald.

WILL CAUSE REFORM.

The action in Guatamala of suspending payment in gold of interest on her bonds has created consternation in financial circles in London, not so much on account of the amount involved in this default as in the fact that it is in all probability the first step in repudiation of the silver countries of the payment of national obligations in gold that were incurred when the two metals were at par. Guatamala owes a little more than $10,000,000 in what may be termed gold bonds. When those bonds were issued there was so little difference between the value of the two metals that objection was considered of no importance as to whether they were issued on a gold basis or not. But now that the attack on silver has brought that metal to grief, the countries that deal in that specie alone are confronted with the fact that every dollar of debt they owe has been swelled into two dollars; or, in other words, that their obligations have been exactly doubled. The $10,000,000 of bonds of Guatemala have been increased practically to $20,000,000. That country bore bravely up under the imposition of a light increase, and continued to pay her interest in gold; but now that she has to sell $1,200,000, let us say, in silver, in order to procure gold enough to pay $600,000 interest, she finds that she has to assume a burden which, through artificial causes, has been made greater than she can bear.

Guatemala starts the ball. She will be followed by other Central and South American States, and we doubt very much whether Mexico will be able to stand the enormous inflation against her very long. The bonded indebtedness of all these states cannot be less than a billion of dollars, and the securities are mainly held in England, France and Germany. Perhaps two-thirds of all the bonds are held in England. Germany is a very large holder of Mexican and South American bonds. It is about time that Emperor William was giving serious attention to the question of bimetallism. Germany is more responsible for the universal depreciation of silver than even England. When she received five millions in gold from France she thought she was doing a smart and profitable thing by demonetizing silver. Perhaps William will see in the light of events that are inevitable, that she made a great mistake. When all the silver republics of this continent make a stand against liquidating their debts by paying two dollars for one, the monometalists of Europe will become sensible to the folly, even if they have no sense of the immorality of their course.

England will, of course, be the greatest loser in the refusal of the silver countries of this continent to pay their debts twice over. Will she attempt to follow the same course with them that she did with Egypt—take possession of the countries and undertake to pay their creditors by managing their finances herself? That would hardly be looked upon with equanimity by the United States. There may arise out of this question many opportunities to put the idea of the Monroe doctrine into practice.

But perhaps the trouble will not reach such an extreme. The people everywhere are getting their eyes widely opened to the infamy of the conspiracy that has demonetized one half of the metallic representative wealth of the world. They begin to see that the gold policy will make the rich richer, and impoverish the productive classes. But the object lessons the former are in the way of receiving from the silver-using countries will do more to make them stop in their headlong career of destruction than any argument, however logical and unanswerable, which the bimetallists can advance—Guatemala's action is the handwriting on the wall.—Herald.

Queen Victoria offered Gladstone a peerage when he gave in his resignation. The old statesman, however, firmly but respectfully declined it. A peerage to the late premier could add no lustre to a name which he has adorned with a higher dignity than any sovereign can confer. Plain Gladstone is a title which he has himself made more illustrious than that of any peer who has sat in the house of lords since Wellington gave dignity to that chamber of hereditary lawmakers.

Governor Markham has declared that he will not be a candidate for renomination.

Beautiful spring weather this week.

Miss Etta Naylor has gone to the Mid-winter Fair.

Ed. M. Clarke V. S. came down from Bishop on Wednesday.

Frederick Stock will arrive at Independence next Thursday from Los Angeles.

T. C. Boland has been suffering severely of late from rheumatism. He is in San Francisco for medical treatment.

L. Wood has received a lot of angler's supplies. Catfish are now plentiful and the trout season is close at hand.

Assessor Chalfant was down from Bishop during the week, making arrangements for beginning the assessment for 1894 5.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz arrived home last Friday after a very pleasant month spent in visiting at San Francisco.

Mrs. J. D. Blair, accompanied by her daughter, Miss Maud Cook, arrived home from Los Angeles yesterday, having visited the Mid-winter Fair on the way.

Under the Australian ballot system politics will not cut much of a figure in the election of County officers; the best and most popular man is likely to get there.

District Attorney Forbes has settled down to the calm enjoyment of domestic pleasures. He proposes to have a garden that for variety will be second to none.

A special meeting of the N. S. G. W. will be held at Independence on Sunday afternoon. A full attendance of the members is earnestly requested, as business of importance is to be transacted.

Chas. Summers, Oscar Hilton and George Kinney, accompanied by their respective better-halves, arrived home last Friday from San Francisco, where they had been visiting the big Fair.

W. J. Holmes, accompanied by two assistants, arrived at the marble quarry last Friday. A number of improvements are in contemplation, and a strong effort will be made to put the works on a paying basis.

A social dance will be given at Mairs' Hall on Friday evening, March 16th. Barnes has concluded not to celebrate this year, and the local sons of the Emerald Isle are determined not to let the day pass without observance.

J. G. Birchim came down from Bishop on Wednesday, returning yesterday. Mr. Birchim has been in very poor health for a long time past and expects to visit lower California soon in hopes of being benefited by change of climate.

C. Mulholland and D. H. Irland arrived from Los Angeles yesterday. Mr. Mulholland came up to attend to some business for the English Board of Directors and stockholders of the Californian Canal Co., and Mr. Irland to look after interests connected with the same enterprise. Both expect to return in a few days.

The Chinaman arrested under suspicion of attempting to burn the residence of S. A. Densmore at Independence was discharged on Wednesday by a writ of habeas corpus. Enough evidence could not be secured to warrant his being held for trial, although there is no doubt that he was the perpetrator of the deed.

SUCCESS ASSURED.

The big canal will be built. It will be built from now onward with vigor. A great deal of work is already done, and it is all well done, as a glance over the ground will show. In all of southern California there there is not another region where such water supply exists as in Owens Valley; and no where else is found more fertile land on which to use the water. There is not to be found in all the southern counties of the State any so extensive area of good land, with plenty of water, as here; nor any irrigation enterprise ever projected in those counties that at all approaches the low price per acre of getting this water on to the land. It is these features that commended the enterprise to the men who will carry it through. At Los Angeles during the past few months very many inquiries have been made about Owens Valley by men who would make the most desirable of settlers. These are American citizens from Minnesota, Wisconsin, Idaho, Oregon, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, and States east of the Missippi. Everybody here knows that during the past few months many strangers have been in the Valley examining the country with a view to settle here. Without a single exception every one of these men on returning to Los Angeles said he had found the country better than it had been described to him, or than he had expected. Many of these men expressed a determination to return home, dispose of their property and come back to Owens Valley. Two of these men who were here a few weeks ago on returning to Los Angeles said they had been fortunate enough to be here during a storm. From remarks they heard, but evidently not intended for their ears, they learned that this storm was about as bad as any ever seen here. These men were from Kansas and both said that in their State such a day as people here complained about would be considered very mild winter weather. In traveling over the Valley these men noted that at every school house many horses were tied that the pupils had ridden there. To the visitors this was excellent evidence of the mildness of the winters; in Kansas they do not dare to let their children ride a few miles to school lest they should get caught in a blizzard and perish.

Nor do all inquiries come from men in distant States. From San Diego, San Bernardino, Riverside, Orange and Los Angeles counties, not a day passes in Los Angeles without many inquiries being made about Owens Valley. From different parts of the Valley men have been at Los Angeles during the past few months and all of them will confirm the truth of this statement. These men of the counties named know that in Owens Valley thrifty farmers can do better growing deciduous fruits; in raising chickens, hogs and cattle and producing alfalfa than in growing oranges in any of the counties named.

Effectively but quietly information on all these matters has been widely distributed and now so much interest has been awakened that settlers are ready to pour into the country as fast as the canal can be constructed and water supplied. None are better informed on this subject than the men who will build the canal, for they declare their fixed resolution to complete it.

Lend A Hand.

The cemetery at Camp Independence has fallen into a state of disrepair, the fence being rotted away so that cattle roam at will through the grounds. Misses Lena Thomson and Annie Bell as a committee are canvassing for funds to make the necessary repairs, and have met with good success. As the County dead are buried there a subscription should be made by the Board of Supervisors to assist in the work, and doubtless will be, if brought to their notice at the next regular meeting. The Cemetery is a historic spot in the annals of Inyo county and should not be suffered to go to decay. The young ladies should be met with every possible assistance in their undertaking.

John Broder Dead.

John Broder died at Oakland on Tuesday of last week. Several months ago he was afflicted with a stroke of paralysis, from which he never recovered. Mr. Broder was a land mark in the early history of Inyo County. At one time he possessed a vast amount of property in this Valley. Through financial reverses he lost a great portion of it. He set to work to recover his losses, and being a man of most indomitable energy, he succeeded to a great extent and at the time of his death was again wealthy. He left this Valley about eight years ago and has since resided in the San Joaquin Valley.

Articles Filed.

Yesterday Hon. P. H. Mack filed the articles of association of the Californian Water-works and Irrigation Company, Limited, in the County Clerk's office. Transfers of all of Mr. Seely's and Mr. Stock's water rights in Owens River to the Company were recorded in the County Recorder's office. This is the English Company now constructing the big Canal from Owens River to Indian Wells Valley and which promises to be one of the best paying enterprises in the United States.

Females and Fashions.

A recent visitor to Samoa tells of a famous village beauty in that remote region whose headdress is thus described: "Round her forehead was a band of small pieces of nautilus shell. Above towered a mass of human hair that had been bleached for months in a marsh, with scraps of looking glass arranged in front, the whole surmounted with a trail of red humming birds' feathers."

Dr. Drummond, in his book of African travel, makes mention of the chieftain's daughter, whose hair, heavily greased with groundnut oil, was made up into small sized balls, like black currants, and then divided into patterns—diamonds, circles and parterres, designed with the skill of a landscape gardener. Both these "arrangements" would in the eyes of Regent street artists and connoisseurs be probably regarded as savage monstrosities, but it is to be doubted whether they are not utterly surpassed by the goldfinch and canary arrangement, by a kingfisher's wing crowned with red shivering glass and sham jewels, both in tawdry insolence and depravity of taste. What is called "barbarous" if found among savages may, after all, be the very height of fashion in Mayfair, though the cheap finery of the Samoan or African belle is marked neither by cruelty to the victim nor by gain to the artist.—Edinburgh Review.

The Coming Window.

A simple mechanical contrivance is being adopted by English builders, by which window sashes may be given two movements, the one upward or downward and the other inward. Practically only one action is required to effect the change from an ordinary sash to a casement window. By dropping a catch at one side of the sash the cord is secured, the window frame being released from the sash and slipping into pivot hinges, when it can be opened as a casement and keys itself in so doing. When closing, the sash again engages with the cord, which runs in a groove in the pulley slide and serves as one of the guides to keep it in its place when working up and down as a sash. In this arrangement the beading, which is generally used to guide and separate the sashes, is entirely dispensed with, the sashes being guided by suitable tongues working in grooves on the right or hinge side. On the left side the sash, when closed for use as a lifting window, engages with a metal block attached to the end of the weight cord, which serves to guide it on the frame, the sash being also so arranged that it cannot possibly come off the hinges except when closed.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Do Babies' Eyes Grow?

How big are "a young baby's eyes?" We have heard it stated that "a young baby's eye" is as big as a grown person's eye; that the eye does not grow as the body grows; that it is the same size when the baby is born as it is after the baby has grown up to be a man or a woman; that it is born full size—is then as big as it ever gets to be. This statement has been submitted to a number of experts on babies, who generally agree that "a young baby's eye" grows as the body grows, though not in the same ratio. But is it true?

Authorities are sometimes in error. Expert witnesses frequently tangle themselves up in all kinds of contradictory statements of facts; expert physicians do not reach the same conclusions from identically the same basis of reasoning; expert cotton buyers oftentimes buy when the slumps in the market prove that they should have sold. It may be that the baby experts whom we have questioned upon the subject of baby eyes have spoken without due consideration. We should like to have the puzzle settled. Do babies' eyes grow? How big is "a young baby's eye?"—Good Housekeeping.

Catching Up with Civilization.

A young gentleman named H. E. Haggard has arrived in Vinita, I. T., direct from San Francisco on a fruitless mission. An Indian calling himself Chief Felix Mayes, of the Cherokees, has been lecturing before the churches and the Y. M. C. A. of San Francisco and collecting money for the purchase of Bibles for this country. He has likewise been profuse in his offers and promises, and in this way caught Haggard, who came to take charge of four large stores which the man represented that he owned at Vinita, Tahlequah, Muscogee and Atoka, this territory. No such man is known here and he certainly was never chief.—Indian Territory Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The largest shipment of apples ever made from the United States left Portland recently in the steamship Labrador, which carried more than 13,000 barrels of fine fruit to England.

A fine collection of Seventeenth century tobacco pipes has just been found under an old London cellar and deposited in the Guildhall museum.

LIEUTENANT LOUISA.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

But I was mistaken; she did come; and she came in the most natural and unsensational way in the world. She came—she was in the room—for a moment she was in my arms; and then all my doubts and troubles were forgotten, and I felt as if our long separation had been but a weary dream.

"My own darling Mary!"

"Charlie, my love, how thin you are! I am so glad!"

"That I am so thin?"

"Oh, Charlie"——

Well, we were very happy. I was almost afraid to love her so much as I did, and yet I knew that I could never love her so much as she deserved. We were together, and we were happy; that was all that either of us knew or cared. But at last Mary declared that I must light the gas.

"For," said she, "how can you pretend to say you love me if you cannot see my face?"

"I do not love you for your face."

"Do you really love me?"

"Love you! I—oh, Mary!"

"But I am so stupid!"

"You must be the cleverest of women."

"Why?"

"Because you can find something worth loving in me.

"Light the gas, sir!"

"First, then, one more ——. The matches are on the mantelpiece; you can light the gas yourself, if you will. I wash my hands of it."

The gas was lighted. Soon after the middle Temple clock struck 5 in its most aggressive tone.

"My father is dining at the Freemasons' tavern to-night," said Mary, "and he is going to dress at his chambers; so I can stay ever so long yet—if you will let me."

"If you stay here till I ask you to go, Mary, you may make up your mind to leave as an old woman."

The words were scarcely out of my mouth when I heard the outer door open. There is a series of four doors between my rooms and the outer passage. A heavy footstep sounded between the first door and the second. Mrs. Swatman or her assistant imbecile had evidently neglected to safeguard the approach, and here was some unknown intruder forcing himself in.

"Mary," I cried, "for heaven's sake—into my bedroom—quick!"

She appreciated the urgency of the occasion and vanished like a bird. Just as the door was closing upon her in walked her father.

"Come, I'm glad to see you looking so much better," said he in a hearty voice. "Why, you've quite a color."

Not a doubt of it. In fact, I felt as though my face might be the tint of a tomato. Luckily Mary when she came in had not taken off any of her things except her sealskin jacket, and that she had snatched up and carried away with her when she escaped.

"Thank you; yes, I'm getting better," was my reply.

"That's right. I'm very glad to hear it. I've something to talk to you about—something I think you can do for me, when you're able to get about, which will occupy you and give you what I'm sure will be beneficial to you—change of air and scene."

Then, taking a chair beside the fire (the very one in which Mary had just been sitting), Mr. Bruce proceeded to unfold his plans. He must have thought that my illness had rendered me extremely fidgety, for it was wsth the greatest difficulty that I could keep still or even pretend to be listening. I was on tenterhooks for poor Mary. The weather was cold, and there was neither fire nor fireplace in my bedroom. I knew moreover that she would be able to distinguish the tones of her father's voice; and the discomfort and distress of her position worried me so much that every other consideration was dwarfed in the comparison. All this, however, did not prevent Mr. Bruce from stating his belief that the marriage of Dalrymple Bruce and Tryphena Maddams had been solemnized in the county of Berkshire and most probably in the vicinity of Abingdon. At any rate the information gained led to the inference that the ceremony in question had taken place at one of the churches in one of the riverside towns of Berkshire. His proposal to me was that I could undertake to make a thorough search among the parish registers, Mr. Bruce paying all the expenses and compensating me for my labor at the rate of a guinea and a half a day.

While he was talking Mr. Bruce had involuntarily taken up an old woolen glove which I kept on the top of the coal box by the fireside to put on when shoveling out coals for the fire. It was grimy as Mrs. Swatman's hands—the ne plus ultra of honest dirt—and before I noticed what he was about his fingers were as soiled as those of a finance agent.

"Oh, what a nuisance!" exclaimed Mr. Bruce. "Dear me! I'll just step into your bedroom and wash." He rose and approached the door.

"No, no!" said I hurriedly, and laboring out of my chair under the influence of abject terror. "No—here—let me fetch the basin in here for you!"

"Nonsense—couldn't think of troubling you. I know my way," he answered, amicably motioning me back to my seat with one hand while he opened the door with the other; and before I could say or do anything further to prevent him Mr. Bruce had entered the bedroom.

If a benevolent earthquake would kindly have made a meal of me at that moment how grateful I should have been. In a state of mind which I do not care to analyze I waited the inevitable explosion. A long second passed away—an everlasting minute—and there was no sign. What had happened? Could Mary have contrived to hide herself anywhere? I tried to reflect. There was a large, deep cupboard in the room that served as a wardrobe. Surely Mary had not had the presence of mind to conceal herself there? Yet it was the only place I could think of into which she could have retired; there was no other solution of the mystery. In a few minutes Mr. Bruce returned with clean hands and unruffled demeanor. Manifestly he had seen nothing and suspected nothing. He resumed the conversation where he had left it off, and after some further talk it was agreed that I should start for Berkshire as soon as the doctor would authorize me to leave the house; first, however, calling on Mr. Bruce to receive his written instructions and a check on account for whatever I thought I should need. Then, at last, my benefactor took his leave, and I hailed his departure as I should that of the gout. I hastened to the bedroom.

"Mary!" I called. "Mary!"

No answer. I searched the cupboard. She was not there.

I looked behind the curtain in a forlorn hope that she might have hidden herself there. No Mary. By what magic had she disappeared? I went down on my hands and knees and peered under the bed. Two overland trunks and a bootjack, but still no Mary.

I summoned Mrs. Swatman.

"Miss Bruce—where is she?" I demanded.

"Do you mean the lady, sir?"

"Yes—the lady—Miss Bruce."

"She's gone, sir."

"I see she's gone, but how did she go?"

"I let her through Mr. Burnett's chambers, sir."

"Through Mr. Burnett's chambers!" I repeated in amazement. "How did you manage that?"

"Why, sir, through the door"——

"What door?" I interrupted impatiently.

"The door that leads from your bedroom into his sitting room, sir."

There was a door by my bedside which was always locked, and for the key of which I had always been going to ask, thinking it was another cupboard. Through this door Mary had escaped. How thankful I was, now, that it had not been a cupboard. It turned out that Mrs. Swatman occasionally used the door when Burnett was away and I was engaged, and that in this instance, the laundress having called, Mrs. Swatman had gone in that way, and had happily been in time to release the terrified Mary from her embarrassing predicament.

I blessed Mrs. Swatman, and did not, as I had fully intended, give her a good blowing up for admitting Mr. Bruce when she knew that I was engaged. She did not know, by the way, that I was "engaged" in the common acceptance of that term. I blessed her therefore, and furthermore presented her with a sovereign, which made her happy for the rest of the week—honest old descendant of Cinderella that she was!

Next morning by the first post I had a letter from Mary. She had been "terribly frightened," poor darling; she had not fully realized the impropriety of coming to my chambers until her father had come upon the scene and she had felt the dread of discovery. I must "never again ask her to be so foolish and wicked," she said. In my answer I promised not to be selfish any more, acquainted her with her father's plans and pointed out that if I were successful we might perhaps hope to approach Mr. Bruce.

In about a fortnight I received my instructions and proceeded to hunt up the Berkshire registers; and a more wearisome task I never undertook. In some cases the registers were well enough kept and were easy of access; in some they had been sold as waste paper or were altogether imperfect; while in a few instances they were so ill cared for that they had become well nigh valueless, and one I found in a decayed old box in a loft over the vicar's cow shed. At Abingdon and more especially at St. Nicholas the registers had been admirably preserved, and it was here that I spent the longest time; but I failed to find the least trace of what I wanted, and not a word either of Dalrymple Bruce or of Tryphena Maddams. Once at Bray and again at Wallingford I thought I was upon the track, while at Cookham a whole colony of Maddams appeared to have been born, married and buried, but not a Tryphena among them all. At St. Lawrence, Reading, there was a record of the marriage in 1793 of a certain Theodosia Maddams to David Bruce, and this bothered me a good deal until I discovered that Theodosia was the widow of one Hezekiah Maddams, "butcher of this towne." After a laborious and painstaking search I came to the conclusion that I was on the wrong scent, and I returned to London in a gloomy and dejected mood.

But Mr. Bruce was very kind, and not only thanked me heartily for the trouble I had been at but marked the genuineness of his satisfaction by presenting me with a check considerably larger than I was entitled to or expected. Mary, who had taken the deepest interest in the investigation, told me one evening when I was dining at their house that she felt certain—she could not tell why—that I should yet, somehow—she could not tell how—unravel this Gordion knot; nay, that it was to be the means whereby we should attain the fulfillment of our hopes. I hoped with all my heart she might be right, but confessed to some skepticism on the point; for which unbelief I received the most delightful scolding from Mary; and "You are not to laugh at me, sir! I will not be laughed at!" (Oh, the way she emphasized that "not!") "It is very rude of you to laugh at me, and you shall do penance!"

Seeing that Mr. Bruce was nodding over his book I did penance, though perhaps not just in the way that Mary had anticipated. It was a very rash act on my part, but the temptation was irresistible. You have never seen Mary or you would understand. Mary blushed horribly and was both scared and indignant; but I pleaded eloquently for absolution and finally appeased her. At parting she said:

"You will see, Charlie, you will find the thing out. Depend upon it. Women know things, you know, that men don't know. Well, I know—I don't know how I know, but I do know that you will discover this Dalrymple Bruce's marriage. I'm as certain of it as I am that we—well, as of anything. So good night, and be a good boy and don't contradict. No! not one, I declare!" (Alarums, excursions.)

The first news that greeted me on my return to my city chambers was that Mrs. Swatman's mummified assistant, Mrs. Crump, was seriously ill. Of course I lost no time in seeing that she had proper attendance, and any little comfort that the doctor might think good for her. The doctor gave a poor account of her. Few men in chambers ever know anything of the inner life of their "laundresses," and from what I learned of Mrs. Crump's surroundings I should say their ignorance was bliss.

In a wretched room in a disreputable looking building in a squalid court off Drury lane the poor old creature had her home. Home! A room not much larger than an old fashioned cupboard; a crazy, tumbledown old wooden bedstead, with quite unmentionable bedclothing; two rickety chairs and a table to match; a deal washstand, with a broken basin; a triangular bit of looking glass scratched and smeared; four or five moldy books

Knew He Was Going.

"I'm only a tramp," said a little, withered old man early yesterday morning in the Mulberry street police station, "but please let me stop here. I've walked a great deal. I'm footsore and weary. I won't be a bother much longer. I'll soon throw in my checks."

He had the pallor of death.

"I never take in any one at 3 in the morning," kindly replied Sergeant Horbelt, "but I'll make an exception in your case. Poor fellow, you look played out."

Yesterday morning Policeman Croughan took the old man, who gave the name of John Irving, to the Tombs police court. He wanted to be committed to the workhouse.

"The top o' th' morning, yer honor," he said to Justice Duffy. "This'll be th' last time I'll bother ye. Give me a good long sentence."

The justice, however, did not fix any specified time. Under the commitment the old man could get his liberty when he wanted it.

"Take your time," said the policeman, as he assisted Irving down the winding flight of stairs leading into the prison.

"My wife!" gasped the old man down stairs.

By this time they had reached the warden's office, where the pedigrees of the prisoners are taken anew.

"Well, what's the matter with your wife?" asked a keeper.

"She's in heaven!" replied the tramp. The next instant he fell back dead into the policeman's arms.—New York World.

MUSCLE AND VIGOR—A DIFFERENCE.

Many muscular men succumb to fatigues borne with ease by persons far their inferiors in physical strength. Muscle does not imply vigor. In fact, it is not difficult of proof that athletes do not live as long nor enjoy as good health as the average individual who is vigorous—that is to say, whose digestion and sleep are unimpaired, whose nerves are tranquil, and who has no organic tendency to disease. These requisites of vigor are conferred upon those inherently weak, no less than upon those debilitated through wasting disease, by a thorough, persistent course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the leading national tonic, indorsed and recommended by physicians of eminence. It will not endow you with a muscle of a Corbett, but it will infuse energy into your system, and renew the active and healthful performance of its functions. It averts and cures malarial, rheumatic and kidney complaints, and overcomes dyspepsia, constipation, liver trouble and nervousness.

"Money talks," remarked the business man who was ruefully contemplating a lot of idle capital; "but it doesn't talk in its sleep."

EXPERIENCE.

Experince teaches not only weakness, but strength and the value of good remedies such as ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. This is what C. D. Fredericks, the well-known photographer of New York, says:

"I have been using ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS for 20 years, and found them one of the best of family medicines. Briefly summing up my experience, I say that when placed on the small of the back ALLCOCK'S PLASTERS fill the body with nervous energy, and thus cure fatigue, brain exhaustion, debility and kidney difficulties. For women and children I have found them invaluable. They never irritate the skin or cause the slightest pain, but cure sore throat, coughs, colds, pains in side, back or chest, indigestion and bowel complaints."

A CLEVER COLLIE.

Although Dash Was Blind He Managed to Save a Creature's Life.

Dash was not a full blooded collie, but he was a fine dog and remarkably intelligent. He was early trained to drive the cows to and from the pasture without assistance. This he did for several years; then he suddenly became blind from what seemed to be paralysis of the optic nerve. For a few weeks he was greatly depressed. He moped about in a disconsolate way and for days together scarcely changed his position. Finally his master succeeded in coaxing Dash to go along with him one morning to drive the cows to pasture.

That afternoon, of his own accord, the dog went after the cattle, and from that time onward he resumed his former habits, doing his work just as well and as faithfully as when he could see. He never made a mistake in the number of the cows, and never left a cow behind save once, and that happened in this wise:

One afternoon when the cows came home Old Brindle was missing. Dash drove the cattle into the barnyard, and then was seen going toward the pasture on a run. A half hour later he returned without the missing cow.

"Where's Brindle, Dash?" his master inquired.

The dog looked despondent. He hung his head and drooped his tail as if with shame.

"Go find Brindle," commanded the master.

Dash turned and ran for a few steps in the direction of the pasture and then trotted slowly back and sat down before his master, as if to say: "It's no use. I've tried, but I can't get that cow."

At his master's repeated command, he again ran off for a few steps, but returned as before, this time whining uneasily.

"Something wrong, is there, old dog? Well, I'll go along and see," said the man, and he started in the direction of the pasture.

A wonderful change came over Dash at this move of his master. Wide awake and tail wagging, he led the way, with occasional sharp, expressive barks.

Without a moment's hesitation he led his master straight to the spot were Old Brindle stood, and then began barking vociferously, as much as to say: "There, you see how it is! I couldn't start her."

The cow had caught her head in the crotch of an apple tree. She had been reaching for apples, and having put her head into the crotch from above, was unable to withdraw it, and there she hung, a picture of stupid misery, in imminent danger of choking to death.

She was released after considerable difficulty, and Dash drove her home. He had saved her life, his master thinks, for she could hardly have lived through the night in such a position.—Youth's Companion.

Black Buck Hunting in India.

The black buck of India is a very graceful animal, weighing between thirty and fifty pounds. The hide of the male when full grown is of inky blackness on the back while the belly is as white as snow, the contrast being very striking. The horns are black and spiral in shape, and in length average about eighteen inches, although they have been known to reach twenty-six inches. The animals are usually found in herds, and are difficult to approach on foot, as the bucks toss their heads into the air from time to time in a very graceful manner, and some one of them is almost sure to detect any attempt at stalking. They are at times hunted on horseback, but the usual method in many sections is to use a conveyance very much like the back of a horse, only shorter and made of wood.

This is on wheels, is drawn by bullocks, and is called a jungle cart. It is very close to the ground, and from both sides project flat pieces of wood, upon which the feet rest. The inside is hollow and holds ammunition and luncheon. It is believed that they take the queer little wooden arrangement on wheels for a plow, and consequently are not much alarmed as it draws nearer them in ever decreasing circles. The bullocks move at the word of command, and are accompanied by a shikaree, or native hunter. The bucks never seem to fear the inhabitants, doubtless having learned they are without guns, and therefore not to be dreaded.—Clarence B. Moore in St. Nicholas.

A College Joke.

As good an example as can be given of the jokes played on new students is the ancient "Pempe" of Winchester college. On the first appearance of a boy in the school a companion will ask him with a kindly air if he has a book called "Pempe Moron Proteron" (Greek for "Send the fool farther"), without which it will be impossible to properly get through his work. Of course he will say "No," and then he will be sent on a wild goose chase from one boy to another in the hopes of obtaining a copy. The game is kept up with great spirit until the older boys are tired of the fun, and then the green lad is referred to one of the masters, who, instead of giving him a volume, as he expects, ends his trouble by explaining to him the joke of "Pempe."—London Tit-Bits.

Wonders In Penmanship.

The renowned Dr. Heylin in his "Life of King Charles" relates the following extraordinary story of the artistic ability of an old time knight of the pen: "In the time of the reign of Queen Elizabeth one Royer wrote the Ten Commandments, the Creed, the Pater Noster, the queen's name and the year of our Lord within a space that could be covered with a penny. He gave her majesty a pair of spectacles of his own artificial making, that by the help thereof she did plainly and distinctly discern every letter."—St. Louis Republic.

IN DIVING ARMOR.

How Delvers in Waters Deep are Equipped and Attended.

EXPENSIVE SUBMARINE OUTFITS.

Construction of the Modern Diving Suit.—Costly Air Pumps.—Story of a Fatal Accident.

Submarine diving has been reduced to such an exact science that there is little work under water that the expert diver cannot do, and it is hardly more dangerous than similar work on the surface.

Minor improvements are making in the suits constantly, but the greatest change within a few years has been in the manner of attaching the helmet. But you must know first how submarine armor is constructed before I can explain this to you. You have the common notion, I suppose, that if you just have a diving suit you can do all the diving you wish. That is a very erroneous idea. The suit is a small part of the necessary apparatus. For instance, you can buy a diving suit for $40, of the best quality, but before you can make a dive you must have apparatus which, of corresponding quality, will cost you $687.

As the pay of a diver is only $5 a day and his work very uncertain, you will readily imagine that the divers do not own their own suits. The suits are bought by wrecking companies and other corporations, and they employ the divers. The most expensive thing about the outfit is the air pump, and the next is the helmet. The diving dress proper is made of india rubber, laid between two layers of canvas, the rubber being entirely covered. A copper collar, which fits over the shoulders, chest and back, is fastened to the rubber suit with 12 bolts. To this collar the helmet is attached. Formerly the helmet was screwed to the collar, but the recent improvement I mentioned is the fastening of the helmet with bolts, which is much stronger and safer.

The helmet is made of sheet copper and weighs about 30 pounds. It has three eyeholes, one in front and one on each side, all filled with half inch thick glass and protected with strong copper wires. On one side is a valve which allows the foul air to escape, and at the back is a copper pipe to which the breathing tube is attached. The sleeve wrists are made of strong rubber, which keeps the water out. The shoes have iron soles, which weigh over 25 pounds each. The heavy leather belt is lined with blocks of lead, weighing in the aggregate 100 pounds. The suit complete weighs about 225 pounds, and on the surface it is very burdensome, but in the water it feels no heavier than any ordinary suit of clothes. The helmet is always the last thing put on. When the diver comes up for a breathing spell, the helmet is not taken off—one of the eycholes is unscrewed, which answers every purpose.

The life line, as we call it—the rope with which the driver communicates with the surface and with which he is hoisted when necessary—passes through a ring in the helmet, and after being bolted in several places to the collar on one side goes through a ring in the belt and is then bolted to the collar on the other side. This is not only a life line, but a telegraph line too. One pull means more wind; two pulls, less wind; three pulls, stop the pump for a moment. You see, the air supply is the main thing, and most of the things relate to it. But the diver may have too much air as well as too little. The air pipe is made much heavier and stiffer than ordinary rubber hose. If it were too limber, it would get into "kinks" and shut off the air.

Three men on the surface attend to one diver—two to work the air pump and one for the air tube and life line. They must be trustworthy men, too, or they will kill the diver. Some companies make it a point to employ father and son or two brothers or very close friends. While one relative dives, the other exercises great care on the surface.

Incased in his armor the diver keeps dry as a chip, and of course the pump gives him plenty of air. But I do not say that he is altogether comfortable. When the water is cold, the diver is cold and requires one or two suits of heavy flannels and woolen mittens to wear beneath his diver's mittens. In clear water he can see very well, but about this harbor the water is not clear, and most of the work must be done by feeling. In fact, it is very hard work—so hard that four hours is counted a full day's work. Formerly the divers' wages were much higher, but they have come down. New York divers probably run less risk than any others in this country because they do more work and know how to keep their apparatus in order. Very much depends upon that, but not everything. Occasionally an accident happens in spite of all the care possible.

The last fatal accident to a diver in this harbor that I remember was several years ago. A steamship had sunk near her dock, and a diver went down to see how she lay. He felt his way along her deck up to the bow, for the water was too muddy for him to see much. It was too muddy, indeed, for him to see that one of the anchors lay on its side with a fluke in the air. As he went up one side of the deck and down the other his life line passed around the anchor. On completing his work he gave the signal to be drawn up, but when his companions drew on the line they only pulled him toward the anchor. He could not see what was wrong, but he managed to get hold of something to cut the line. Unfortunately, instead of the life line, he cut the air tube, and before he could be extricated he was drowned. The men on the surface immediately dived for him without any armor, but they were too late.—Interview in New York Sun.

Joan of Arc.

Jeanne d'Arc was a genius by her intrepid will. She had faith in her visions. Her faith rested upon the immovable foundation of numerous hallucinations having the force of moral and intellectual impulsion, making her superior to those around her. Science can pronounce as to her inspirations, but its judgment does not diminish in the least the merit of her heroism. Jeanne was of the peasant class and uneducated. According to her statement, she first heard supernatural voices when she was 13 years old.—New York Times.

Didn't Dare Do It.

A certain popular but extravagant musician was famous not only for his fine voice, but for his almost irresistible manner. At one time when he was deeply in debt a carpenter to whom he owed a large amount called at his house and clamorously demanded his pay.

The musician, who was indisposed at the time, heard the angry voice in the entry below, and going to the head of the stairs asked what was the matter down there.

"Matter enough," cried the carpenter. "I want my money, and I can't get it."

"Don't get in a passion," said the musician soothingly. "Do me the favor to walk up stairs, if you please, and we will talk the business over."

"No, sir," replied the poor carpenter, "not a step will I stir up those stairs! You owe me $100 already, and if I came up goodness knows you'd most likely owe me $200 before I got down again!"—Youth's Companion.

More Important.

"Better let us build a house for you out on your property at Installment heights," said Buttress, the architect, to his friend Will Norris.

"I don't want to build. I only bought the lots for a quick turn," replied the latter.

"You might do worse. It's a pretty place."

"I know it, but I shouldn't care to live there."

"You might do worse. You'd better build anyway. You'll be more apt to get a good price for the rest of the lots if you improve some of them."

"Think so?"

"Yes, and you'll save your rent. Let us put up one of our attractive little suburban cottages for you, and before you've been in it six months some one will come along and take the place off your hands at a handsome profit. But you won't want to sell out."

"I will if I get the chance."

"Oh, no, you won't," protested Buttress warmly. "You won't want to sell one of our houses! No one ever does. You'll grow attached to it and marry and settle down there. And you'll have no trouble in getting the girl either. You've no idea what we can do in the building line. I tell you what, old man, we guarantee a wife with every house we put up!"

"Ah, I have no doubt," said young Norris sagely. "But do you guarantee a cook?"—Life.

SAVED THE MONEY

Was it Bravery or Foolhardiness That Induced the Operator to Fight.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH ED DALTON.

A Telegrapher's Story of His Struggle With a Famous Robber for the Possession of $5,000.

When I read of adventures, there comes to my mind my encounter with a notorious outlaw of the name of Ed Dalton. For years he had robbed mail coaches and waylaid and murdered travelers who were belated and so unfortunate as to meet him.

I was employed by the Northern Pacific railway as telegraph operator. It was in the latter part of the winter that the most terrible storm broke upon that section of the country that was ever known. The wind blew a strong gale from the northwest, and the air was full of snow.

All trains were late, and I had found no time to leave my office and take an express package of $5,000 to the bank for safe keeping. The station was crowded and our safe small, so that I usually deposited the company's money in the bank—not liking to risk it in the office. I had an order from the dispatcher not to go to bed till after No. 4 had passed. This was the western bound limited, due at Cameron at 10 minutes of 11.

It was a lonely night. The wires hummed and sobbed in the wind as though they could not withstand the fury of the storm. I had finished my work and was sitting half asleep near the stove, which was filled with coal and red as a cherry, when a sensation of some impending danger took possession of me. Trying to shake it off, I walked to my desk, threw open the key and asked the operator on the "night trick" at Hudson how No. 4 was.

"On time," clicked the instrument in reply, and I stirred the fire, turned the blaze of my lamp higher and sat down again.

For 15 or 20 minutes I sat listening to the monotonous click so musical to the operator's ear, when I became conscious some one was looking through the window, and a thought of the express package flashed through my mind. At the same instant a crashing of glass was followed by a gruff voice saying:

"Move and you are a dead man!"

I did not stir, but I realized that I was looking straight into a six shooter. While I was wondering how I could save the money the robber broke out the rest of the window pane and crawled in over my desk.

Oh, for some way to reach my trusty "bulldog," which was lying in full sight under the ticket window. Useless wish! Ordering me to rise, the ruffian calmly took my chair and proceeded to warm his chilled members before "cleaning out" the office, all the while keeping the revolver pointed at my head. Glancing around, he spied my pistol and coolly put it in his pocket. As he rose he said:

"Well, now I am ready for business. I will just trouble you for that little package with the red seals that is in your safe."

I was desperate enough to say anything and broke into a loud, harsh laugh as he finished.

"Was ever anything more lucky?" I cried, and my voice sounded like a croak. "Why, my friend, I have been waiting for a chance to rob the express company for a month, and if you are bound to take the package we will divide the contents and skip together."

He looked at me a moment with a skeptical sneer.

"Bosh! Don't talk stuff! Whatever you do be quick about it and look a little out that you play me no trick, or I'll finish you."

I turned the combination and drew the safe door open, making up my mind to throw myself upon him if he moved his revolver away for an instant. It did not seem likely that opportunity would favor me, but as I took the money from the safe and handed it to him he lowered his weapon.

The critical time had come! If I should fail to overpower the fellow, it meant death for me.

I sprang upon him with the strength of a madman, and so unexpected was the movement that we both went sprawling on the floor, the revolver discharging itself harmlessly as we fell. The robber soon struggled to his feet, and lifting me completely from the floor forced me through the ticket window.

But I had wrestled often while at college, and as I crashed through the glass I whirled him around, throwing my left foot back of his in such a way that the next instant found him on his head in a corner. Wild with excitement, I pinned him to the floor, pulling my old "bulldog" from his pocket and changing the situation by placing the muzzle against his temple.

"Lie still, my friend," I panted, "or it will be worse for you!"

At that very moment I heard the familiar whistle of No. 4, which was approaching the station, but would not stop unless signaled. I was master of the situation now. I could stretch out my left hand and touch the signal board, and with a loud cry of triumph that sounded strange and savage in my own ears I turned it. I heard the airbrakes and escaping steam, and then the train came to a full stop. Directly afterward the office door opened, and the conductor came swinging his lantern and expecting his train orders.

I suppose he understood the tableau before him, but that was all I knew for some time.

When I became conscious of what was going on around me, they had my robber bound hand and foot, and an eager crowd stood round my chair, praising my bravery and congratulating me on saving the large sum of money and capturing the boldest robber west of Cameron, the famous Ed Dalton.

Was it bravery? Sometimes I think it was foolhardiness, but it paid me well, for both railway and express companies rewarded me generously in money and advance of position.—Archie Eggleson.

The Dreaded Bushmaster.

While the rattlesnake prefers the woodland border and the unfrequented copse, and the moccasin and fer de lance confine themselves to the flat lands by the river, the bushmaster roams over hilly regions in the depths of the vast forests of South America, where every bird and beast, even the fierce jaguar, leave him undisputed king. With fangs of wondrous length and poison exceedingly copious, 'tis especially his great strength and consequent power of striking to such a remarkable distance that render him truly the terror of the woods. He grows to the length of from 8 to 10 feet, and has been found 13½. He is as thick as the largest part of a man's arm; in color he is a light chocolate, with great blackish saddles crossing his back from head to tail. His name is one of dire significance.

Woe to him who approaches without making a careful calculation both of his position for striking and of the distance to which he can reach. Now, deadly snakes can usually launch themselves to a distance equal to two-thirds or even three-fourths of their own length. What, then, must be the peril of attempting to take an eight or ten foot bushmaster with an eight foot stick? The striking distance depends altogether on the manner of the coil. If this is well laid he has full power. But if on the contrary, as is usually the case, it is entangled within itself, or with surrounding roots or branches, his striking distance is curtailed.

Should he be encountered with untrammeled coil the hunter must keep at a respectful distance and force him to shift his position until he becomes involved so as to reduce the biting range, and so allow a safe approach. Then even the great bushmaster may be taken with little risk, as I once did a very large one in the forests of Trinidad; although had his coil been well laid he could have struck me in the face or breast.—George R. O'Reilly in Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

An Interesting Change of Color.

A. F. Walters, a young chemist and electrician of Jersey City, entertained a few of his friends some nights ago with a bit of legerdemain that Hermann himself might be proud of. Seating one of the company in the middle of the room the chemist produced a mysterious looking black wand which he began to wave about the head of his subject. The face, neck and hands of the subject, who was of very light complexion, instantly began to grow darker and darker until they were very dark brown.

After the astonishment of the spectators had subsided the young chemist explained that his magic was but the result of a very difficult chemical reaction that he had been working to obtain for a year. He had washed the face, neck and hands of the subject with a transparent solution. Under his own arm he had concealed a small rubber bag of gas, which was connected by rubber tube with the black wand, itself a hollow tube, so that while waving the wand he had ejected the gas. As soon as the gas came in contact with the solution on the skin a dark brown compound resulted from the reaction.

Mr. Walters got the idea of his invention while watching the transformation tricks in one of the Hanlon plays. His first experiment he made on the face of a young German. It worked perfectly as far as coloring the man was concerned, but the black would not wash off, and the German spent several unhappy days trying to wear it off. But now Walters has worked on his compound until it will wash off more easily than cork black.—New York World.

Curiosities of Conscience Money.

Doubts are frequently expressed as to the sanity of persons who indulge in the habit of remitting "conscience money" to the chancellor of the exchequer, but there can be no two opinions about an aged couple named Letoux, residing at Levallois-Perret, who are suffering from a highly interesting mania. Periodically they send to President Carnot sums of money, varying from twenty pounds to sixty pounds, in the imaginary belief that they are indebted to the state in regard to building material purchased by them from the historical Chateau de Blois.

Needless to say that M. Carnot makes a point of returning these remittances through the medium of M. Guilhen, the local commissary of police, who, however, experiences some difficulty in carrying out his instructions. On calling at the domicile of the Letoux with the last installment, he found the door locked and had to force an entrance. The couple refused to speak a word to the representative of the law, who accordingly placed the bank notes on the mantelshelf and withdrew. M. and Mme. Letoux also send occasional remittances to the department of public estates, which is also obliged to use force in order to restore the money.—Paris Cor. London Telegraph.

A Second Season Miss.

It was at one of the large receptions of the season that after a spin about the ballroom a young matron and her partner started for the conservatory to discuss the ethics of dancing in leisurely fashion. As they entered the place and stood for a moment to note the beauties of an unusually fine palm there came from behind the thickly clustered foliage a most familiar sound, as though "an artillery of bliss were let off in one tremendous kiss." A moment of silence, and then with a little laugh came the remark in a fresh, young, girlish voice, "You kiss just like Jack W——."—Washington Post.

Geology and Biology.

Geology is the complement of biology. As soon as one has mastered the rudiments of botany and zoology, and of the distribution of life forms in space, the range of his thoughts should be extended to take in the orderly succession of life in past ages and the evolution of modern, specialized plants and animals from the earlier, generalized types.—Professor A. POPULAR MUSIC.

How Airs That Please the Masses are Regarded by Musical Critics.

ARROGANCE BORN OF HIGH CULTURE

A Vocalist Writes About a Song He Has Sung for Years and Which Never Fails to "Take."

There is an arrogance born of a high degree of culture which is almost insufferable. Particularly is this true of highly educated musicians. This arrogance is largely unconscious, and comes from an intimate acquaintance with the higher forms and technical phases of an art which finds its highest expression in the voices of birds and the music of a brook. Now and then a fugitive symphony is written, in which the harmony of nature is caught to some extent by the composer, and even the unlettered in the most divine of arts can recognize it. But in the majority of cases the effort is a soaring after the infinite, a reaching after the unattainable. Then these attempts become only an exhibition of mechanical dexterity in their execution.

What man or woman is there in the world who, without having some previous knowledge of the composer, or without having heard the title of a piano solo, could tell what the author meant to convey? There may be something in the tune or rhythm which will enable one to distinguish between a dirge and a quickstep, but that is all. After that to the most acute musical intelligence harmonic sound is meaningless and expressionless.

This brings me to the subject of my argument, that too much contempt is expressed by those acquainted with the mechanical forms of music for what is known as popular melody. You mention, for instance, "Annie Rooney" to Paderewski, and he will turn up his cultured Polish nose with contempt.

The ordinary common folks, who have not been initiated into the arcanum of musical gymnastics and pyrotechnics, want to know what it is all about. "What the deuce is that woman playing? What does it all mean?" we say.

The same argument holds good regarding vocal music. Everything is sacrificed to "tone purity." If the roulades are run smoothly and the sustained tones are pure and even the critical ear is satisfied. But not so the man ignorant of higher refined art in musical expression. He wants to hear the words and catch the sentiment. He is perfectly willing to lose some of the sweetness provided he gets an idea of what it is all about. I am perfectly aware that many men of superior intelligence may read these lines and say that the man who wrote them is an ass, and that he is struggling with a subject of which he knows nothing.

To this I can only reply that I know as much about the subject as he does in its utilitarian application. It is my theory that the thing which appeals most forcibly to the greatest number is really the highest form of art.

Let us take by way of illustration what I consider to be the most popular song in the world. It has been adopted by the Press club as its official song, and Colonel John A. Cockerill, president of the club, says that it is the most hamonizing influence that ever entered the clubhouse. The song I allude to is called "Scatter Seeds of Kindness." It is hidden away in a mass of canting rubbish in one of the Moody and Sankey hymn books. The song appeared originally without the music, under the title of "If We Knew." As it appears in the modern form the stanzas have been changed around somewhat, and one stanza in the original has been omitted.

It is fitted to a simple little melody, written by S. J. Vail, which is eminently appropriate to the theme and so free from musical technicalities that a child can learn it in a few minutes. When I say that this song is the most popular song I speak advisedly, for it is sung now, and has been sung for many years, in the Sunday schools in all the countries where the English tongue is spoken. Moreover, it is sung by persons who have no religious belief whatever. Yet it is instinct with the deepest and holiest religious feeling. Here is the first stanza:

Let us gather up the sunbeams lying all around our path,
Let us keep the wheat and roses, casting out the thorns and chaff;
Let us find our sweetest comfort in the blessings of today,
With a patient hand removing all the briers from the way.

Then the song becomes somber and prophetic. But all great art is somber. It dips deep down into human destiny. It is realism personified. And yet a man of keen intelligence, a lover of mysterious sonnets whose meaning could not be discerned with the Lick observatory telescope, once said to me:

"Why, my dear fellow, that's only doggerel!"

Perhaps he was right. But if so, then Longfellow's "Excelsior" is doggerel, and the "Dear Little Shamrock" is doggerel, and the "Suanee River" is the veriest rot. What we need in America, in my opinion, is fewer sonnets and more homely sentiment expressed in language as plain as the following:

If we knew the woe and heartache waiting for us down the road;
If our lips could taste the wormwood; if our backs could feel the load,
Would we waste today in wishing for a time that ne'er could be
Would we wait in such impatience for our ships to come from sea?

There's the song of the true metal in that stanza, men and women. How many of us are figuratively standing on the Battery looking for the spars of our ships to rise above the horizon? We stand and wish and wait and long for fortune to sail in to us, forgetting that the richest fortune is not material success. The sentiment contained in the second stanza is deepened in the two last, which are as follows:

If we knew the baby fingers pressed against the window pane
Would be cold and stiff tomorrow, never trouble us again,
Would the bright eyes of our darling catch the frown upon our brow?
Would the print of rosy fingers vex us then as they do now?

Ah, those little ice cold fingers, how they call our memories back
To the hasty words and actions strewn along our backward track.
How those little hands remind us, as in snowy grace they lie,
Not to scatter thorns, but roses, for our reaping by and by.

There, critics, I've committed myself. Flay me on the gridiron of your cynicism! Knock me out with your material logic! But you can safely bet a five dollar gold piece against a big red apple that I'll get up again and sing that little song, as well as my poor voice will permit, to the boys and girls who never go to Sunday school. I've sung it in a cathedral to a great organ accompaniment; I've sung it at an east side musicale in a cellar in Oak street; I've stammered through it in desolate Connemara, with the poor peasants showing me such homage as a king might be grateful for. No argument, no sophistry can convince me that it does not contain "the essence of all things worth living and hoping for."—Ernest Jarrold in New York Advertiser.

A Strange Story of a Crime.

A story which, if true, is one of the most sensational on record reaches Paris from the Spanish frontier. A farmer and his wife, living at Peralada, near Figueras, had saved up sixty pounds in order to hire a substitute to serve in the army for their son, who had been called upon to join the colors. The parents, accompanied by their boy, set out the other day for Gerona in order to find the substitute, leaving their daughter Dolores to keep house in their absence. Meanwhile a local bad character named Foulanou, who lived in the next house to the farmer, overheard the latter and his wife as they were conversing about the object of their proposed visit to Gerona. He also learned through eavesdropping operations the amount of money raised and heard the farmer's wife locking it up in a wardrobe.

When the coast was clear of everybody but Dolores, Foulanou—his face covered with a mask—entered his neighbor's house, closed the door of it carefully after him, and going to the kitchen there seized the girl, gagged her and bound her to an iron post which supported a beam. Standing over Dolores with a knife, the robber made her point to the place where the sixty pounds was secreted. As he was putting the money in his pocket the girl muttered some words of reproach, whereupon Foulanou said that as she recognized him despite his disguise she must die. She could, however, choose the manner of her death, whereupon the girl said she preferred hanging to being butchered with the robber's knife.

The most sensational part of this story is its climax. Foulanou, in tying the rope whice he intended for the maiden, got his neck hopelessly entangled in it, and was accidentally strung up himself. Then there arrived on the scene, like a true hero of romance, the lover of Dolores, who was accompanied by a crowd of villagers and Foulanou's wife. The robber was released from his perilous position, restored to consciousness and handed over to justice. The curtain fell as Dolores was lifted from the ground by her deliverer, while the robber's wife went off into a fit of hysterics.—Paris Cor. London Telegraph.

Bismarck's Former Cook the Quickest.

The fastest cooking, authentically attested, was done not long ago by Prince Bismarck's former chef, who is now chief cook in a famous restaurant of Berlin. He had made a bet with a regular guest of the place that he could kill, dress, cook and serve a chicken in six minutes. The exploit was to be performed before invited spectators.

At 9 o'clock on the appointed evening the cook appeared with his gas cooking stove on a platform in sight of all in the room. He waved the chicken around his head and it cackled loudly. Decapitating the fowl with one blow of a glittering knife, this gastronomic expert within sixty seconds had removed every feather from it. The gas stove was already lighted, with a broiler upon it. The fowl was cut open and drawn in one other minute and placed upon the broiler; a hot dish garnished with watercress was at hand, and it lacked just a second of the six minutes when the chicken was served.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Encouragement to Literary Beginners.

The Brownings had an apartment near the Rond point, where we used to go and see them, only to find the same warm and tranquil atmosphere that we used to breathe at Rome—the sofa drawn out, the tiny lady in the corner, the afternoon sun dazzling in at the window. On one occasion Mr. Hamilton Aide was paying a visit. He had been talking about books, and, half laughing, he turned to a young woman who had just come in and asked her when her forthcoming work would be ready. Young persons are ashamed, and very properly so, of their early failures, of their pattes de mouches and wild attempts at authorship, and this one was no exception to the common law, and answered "Never," somewhat too emphatically.

And then it was that Mr. Browning spoke of one of those chance sayings which make headings to the chapters of one's life. "All in good time," he said, and he went on to ask us all if we remembered the epitaph on the Roman lady who sat at home and spun wool. "You must spin your wool some day," he said kindly to the would be authoress; "every woman has wool to spin of some sort or another; isn't it so?" he said, and he turned to his wife.

I went home feeling quite impressed by the little speech, it had been so gravely and kindly made. My blurred pages looked altogether different somehow. It was spinning wool—it was not wasting one's time, one's temper—it was something more than spoiling paper and pens.—Anne T. Ritchie in Harper's.

Cutting Ice by Electricity.

A new departure in ice cutting has been proposed by a man who contends that it is quite practicable to cut the ice by means of a wire, heated electrically. His plan is to install a portable steam and dynamo plant at some convenient point on the shore, near to the ice harvesting operations, and run from the dynamo a suitable steel wire of the required length with a proper return. By generating a sufficient current to maintain the temperature in the wire at about 200 degs., and by stretching the wire taut along the surface of the ice a means of cutting through the mass would at once be established.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Married on an Eleven-year-old License.

Vaclav Koran and Elizabeth Fredrick were made husband and wife by Justice Daniel L. Wheeler Friday afternoon on the authority of a marriage certificate issued Sept. 27, 1881, eleven years ago. The license bore the signature of County Clerk E. F. C. Klokke. Koran is now forty-three years old, and she is two years older. The obstacle which had kept apart their yearning hearts so many years was the veto of an angry father. A year ago the father died, and after waiting twelve months for propriety's sake the constant lovers were married.—Chicago Herald.

FRIDAY, MARCH 16 1894

Lord Rosebery has outlined his policy in a liberal and manly way, and those that feared that by the new cabinet home rule would be shelved may feel assured by the Premier's words. "The liberal party", his Lordship said, "had not changed its policy in the least since the retirement of Gladstone. The present members are pledged to procure the success of the measures that Mr. Gladstone had done so much for. To the solution of the great question the Government was bound by every tie of honor, and the policy of home rule would not be less definitely pursued, a fact that the retention of John Morley as Chief Secretary for Ireland fully proved. But the most suprising part of Lord Rosebery's policy is in his remarks regarding the House of Lords, and we confess to a feeling of astonishment when reading his avowel that in democratic England to-day the "House of Lords is an anomaly." He will follow Gladstones policy in this, also, and before long the world may see a new governing force in Great Britain, with the vetoing power in the hands of those who are in favor of progress and opposed to retrogression.

There has been much talk recently about a third party holding the balance of power in the next Presidential election. The voting strength of a third may be increased out of its natural proportions by combinations between the smaller of the two national parties and the third party. For example, in 1892, in five States, the Democrats, having no show by themselves, transferred their votes to the Populists. They were the more free in forming their alliance from the fact that if the election of President should fall to the House, the election of the Democratic candidate was assured. Some of the Eastern Democratic journals are now complaining of the consideration accorded to the comparatively small Populist vote in Congress. The Populists have even dictated an important feature of the Wilson tariff—the income tax. To most Eastern Democrats this means of raising revenue is distasteful but they fear the result should the Populists in the Senate vote against the bill. It is not certain that a third party with a well defined policy may not do good work in Congress. Holding the balance of power they may restrain the dominant party from adopting extreme measures. In the present Congress the Populists are for free trade, free coinage and an income tax. They cannot carry any one of their measures, but they can compel the other parties in order to get their support for a proposed measure to temper their legislation with Populist ideas.

We are tired of hearing that this tariff or that is not built upon scientific principles. It is only in the closet that such a tariff can be constructed. But when it comes to formulate one in a deliberative body such as congress in which all the states are represented it becomes a matter of give and take, concession here and exaction there, and if scientific principles come in conflict with actual and great interests of the country, so much the worse for scientific principles. The only admissible principle that can underly the building up of a tariff that its construction shall be governed by the maxim, a tariff for revenue and the incidental protection of American industries. A tariff constructed on this principle will pay due regard to all the interests of the country and at the same time furnish sufficient revenue for the support of the government. A tariff which highly protects manufacturers under the plea of giving good wages and employment to American operatives cannot carry out the object of its creation by leaving the doors of the country open to the unlimited immigration of foreigners. A restriction upon the importation of certain manufactures and the unrestricted importation of foreign labor, instead of protecting the American workman and maintaining a good rate of wages practically works otherwise. It floods our country with foreign labor, and as wages depend upon the principle of supply and demand, the capitalist manufacturer is thus enabled to take advantage of the condition of the labor market. He is practically doubly protected by a monopoly of his manufactures and in the lowness of the wages he is enabled to impose on his operatives. If this is scientific tariff the American people would be better off without it.

Social dance at Mairs' Hall this evening.

Apricot trees are now donning their spring dresses.

C. Mulholland expects to return to Los Angeles on Sunday.

Ed Ober went to Big Pine yesterday and will return to-day.

Regular meeting of the Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M. to-morrow night.

Gentle Spring and the Chinese fiddle have made a simultaneous appearance.

Miss Leora Collins expects to go to Los Angeles in a few days on a visit for a month.

E. A. Pueschel of Bakersfield has been appointed receiver of the land office at Visalia.

A pump and a footrace are a good deal alike. Neither are any good without a sucker.

A telegram from Mr. Stock announces that he will leave Los Angeles for Independence to-morrow.

Messrs. Irland and Carter started for Los Angeles last Sunday. They are expected back in a few days.

Independence got "skinned" on Wednesday, but some of the boys are anxious to have the operation repeated Sunday.

The C. & C. has given a special rate on freight from Los Angeles to Independence of $1.90 per hundred on car-load lots.

Pat Keyes spent several days in town this week. He is mining in the Beveridge district about sixteen miles from town.

Wills and Brown are steadily engaged on their abstract of Inyo county titles. It will be a valuable work when completed.

When the Indian Wells canal gets under full headway horses and mules will be good property to own. And that will be very soon.

Charley Collins went to Keeler yesterday to secure more scrapers and other implements for use on the canal. He will return to-day.

The boys around town are not very flush of money, but it is quite likely that considerable collateral will change hands on Sunday's race.

Announcements for County officers will soon be in order. The prospect of a four-years term is sufficient inducement for a long, hard struggle.

Owens Valley bids fair to become the best county on the Coast. Real distress is a thing unknown here and the future prospects are very bright.

Farmers in the vicinity say there is less snow in the mountains than usual this year, but that the ground is unusually full of water for the season.

There will be more grain grown in the Valley this year than ever before. A considerable acreage has already been seeded to barley in this vicinity.

The base ball craze has run out in the big cities, but still effects the rural population. Independence has a regular weekly game with a matinee every day in the week.

Henry Levy will start for San Francisco to-morrow. He has been in poor health for a long time and will obtain medical treatment, and incidentally visit the big Fair.

Work on the big canal is being steadily advanced, about 2,000 yards of dirt being moved per day. Arrangements will soon be made to greatly extend the working facilities.

The big map of Inyo county has been completed and forwarded to San Francisco, where it will be placed in the space allotted to Inyo county, and is sure to attract a great deal of attention.

"Skinned."

On Wednesday afternoon a foot-race was run at Independence between Walter Ober and Tom Taylor. The distance was 100 yards on the track north of the Court-house. The contestants started with a handkerchief, running, and while Taylor had a little the best of it, the start was a good one. Taylor won the race in hollow style in the fast time of ten seconds. Ober has run many races in the Valley and is well known here. His best race was when he defeated Rosenthal of Hawthorne on July 4th, 1890. Of Taylor very little is known. He came to Independence about three months ago and went to work for E. Robinson as a ranch hand. The match with Ober was made on short notice and neither man was presumably in condition. Taylor backed himself to the last and won nearly one thousand dollars. He was supposed to have only a hundred dollars but kept "digging up" enough to accommodate all takers. The result proved him to be a very fast man who knew he had a "cinch" and played it for all it was worth. On Wednesday night another match was made between Taylor and Ed. Ober, a brother of Walter's, for five hundred dollars a side, a forfeit of two hundred dollars being deposited, to run on Sunday at 3 o'clock. It has always been supposed that Walter Ober was the faster of the brothers at 100 yards, but presumably the match is made on the strength of Ed. being in the best condition. It is quite likely that $10,000 will change hands on the result of Sunday's race, as Taylor says he has plenty of "stuff", and Ober has many friends in the Valley who will back him to the last.

The recent footracing fever that has struck town recalls reminiscences of early days. On referring to the old INDEPENDENT files we find that Dan. Crough and Mark Huff ran at Lone Pine on Feb. 22, 1880, the distance being 75 yards, for $250 a side. Quoting from the report: "Estimates vary as to the total amount hazarded on the result, but probably $1,200 had been staked when a Cerro Gordoite proffered a $1,000 check even on Huff. Ever since the race a number of Independence men have been disgusted with themselves because they allowed that fact to weaken them right there." Crough won by 3 feet, the time given being 8¼ seconds. On the 27th of December, 1880, Dan. Crough ran at Independence against an unknown who gave the name of Dan. James, and subsequently said he was J. W. Day. The distance was 100 yards for $500 a side, over the track north of the Court House, which has a fall of 5½ feet. They ran with a flying start, both getting a good send off. The man ran even for 60 yards when James spurted and beat Crough out about 3 feet. The race was run in 10½ seconds. According to this Taylor's run last Wednesday in 10 seconds over the same track must be regarded as very swift and in order for Ed. Ober to win on Sunday he must be all of 20 feet faster than Dan Crough at his best, as Taylor can surely run 5 feet faster than he did in his last race. There is much confidence on both sides and undoubtedly the race will be a corker.

Charley Summers is down from Bishop. He held a reception in front of the Norman House last night and described the Mid-winter fair, including a vivid picture of the City Hall. Charley knows something about that place. He says that the main objection to the sleeping apartments there is that while you are helped in, it is hard to get out.

Miss Leora Collins has sent in her resignation as teacher of the Fort school to take effect to-day. Miss June Skinner who has taught the primary department of the Independence school for the present term will complete the unexpired term of the Fort school and Mrs. S. C. Mulholland will complete the term in town.

A St. Patrick's Day ball will be given at Mairs' Hall to-night with supper at the Norman House. It is a cold day when old Ireland fails to celebrate the day when St. Patrick drove the snakes out of Ireland, and in revenge they went into the whiskey.

They say that up at Big Pine one man said another was one. The other said he might be but wanted proof; and in the effort to prove it the party making the statement was adorned with a beautiful pair of black optics.

George Meads arrived from Mojave with his big team early in the week. He had a light load owing to a quantity of freight he was expecting not arriving. He will be down from Bishop to-day with a load of flour.

There are over one hundred head of horses and fifty-five men at present employed in constructing the big canal to Indian Wells Valley. It requires a considerable quantity of hay and grain to keep the force going.

It is announced by wire that the Bland bill for the coinage of the $54,000,000 of silver seignorage passed the Senate yesterday by a vote of 44 to 31. This is regarded as a sure indication that a free coinage bill will ultimately be passed.

An exhibition of the phonograph was given at Mairs' Hall on Wednesday evening. The machine was out of kilter, however, and the affair was turned into a social dance that was highly enjoyed.

E. Robinson will leave for Los Angeles early next week with his beef cattle, in all about 125 head. He met with good success in disposing of them and hopes to get them to market in good condition.

John E. Jones and his son-in-law, J. W. Riggs, came down from Round Valley yesterday to inquire into the flour market. He says there is nothing of special interest stirring in his section.

Local orchardists have been busy pruning for the past week. There is nothing on a farm that will yield a better return than a good orchard well cared for.

John Alexander has been cleaning up the Odd Fellows cemetery and getting the hydrants in order for irrigating. It will be made a very pretty spot.

A south wind is blowing and the prospect for a spring rain is very good.

R. Hession is down from Big Pine on a visit for a few days.

Royal Baking Powder never disappoints; never makes sour, soggy or husky food; never spoils good materials; never leaves lumps of alkali in the biscuit or cake; while all these things do happen with the best of cooks who cling to the old-fashioned methods, or who use other baking powders.

Firemen Fought While the Village Burned

At 3 o'clock in the morning word came from Piercetown, Ind., a village of 1,200 inhabitants, that one of the principal business blocks was on fire. Two fire companies were sent from Warsaw but could do nothing with the burning building, and it was soon destroyed. Edward Mosey, clerk in a store in the burning block, jumped from the second story window and broke a leg.

When the fire was at its worst a couple of the members of the two companies became involved in a controversy. Each company took the side of its member, and for awhile the fire was forgotten and the companies turned their nozzles on each other. In the meantime the building was consumed.—Cor. Washington Post

A RAILROAD ENGINEER RELATES HIS EXPERIENCE.

The Wonderful Story Told by Fred C. Vose and His Mother-in-Law to a Reporter of the Boston Herald. Both are Restored After Years of Agony.

[From the Boston Herald.]

The vast health-giving results already attributed by the newspapers throughout this country and Canada to Dr. Williams' "Pink Pill for Pale People" have been recently supplemented by the cases of two confirmed invalids in one household in a New England town. The names of these people are Fred C. Vose, his wife and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Oliver C. Holt, of Peterboro, members of the same household.

To the Herald reporter who was sent to investigate his remarkable cure Mr. Vose said: "I am 37 years old, and have been railroading for the Fitchburg for 15 years. Since boyhood I have been troubled with a weak stomach. For the past 7 years I have suffered terribly and constantly. My stomach would not retain food; my head ached constantly and was so dizzy I could scarcely stand; my eyes were blurred; I had a bad heartburn, and my breath was offensive. I had physicians, but they failed to help me. My appetite gave out, and four years ago I developed palpitation of the heart, which seriously affected my breathing. Had terrible pains in my back and had to make water many times a day. I finally developed rheumatic signs and couldn't sleep nights. If I lay down my heart would go pit-a-pat at a great rate, and many nights I did not close my eyes at all. I was broken down in body and discouraged in spirit, when some time in February last, I got a couple of boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Before I had finished the first box I noticed that the palpitation of my heart, which had bothered me so that I couldn't breathe at times, began to improve. I saw that in going to my home on the hill from the depot, which was previously an awful task, my heart did not beat so violently and I had more breath when I reached the house. After the second and third boxes I grew better in every other respect. My stomach became stronger, the gas belching was not so bad, my appetite and digestion improved, and my sleep became nearly natural and undisturbed. I have continued taking the pills three times a day ever since last March, and to-day I am feeling better than at any time during the last eight years. I can confidently and conscientiously say that they have done me more good, and their good effects are more permanent, than any medicine I have ever taken. My rheumatic pains in legs and hands are all gone. The pains in the small of my back, which were so bad at times that I couldn't stand up straight, have nearly all vanished, and I find my kidneys are well regulated by them. This is an effect not claimed for the pills in the circular, but in my case they brought it about. I am feeling 100 per cent. better in every shape and manner.

The reporter next saw Mrs. Holt, who said: "I am 57 years old, and for 14 years past I have had an intermittent heart trouble. Three years ago I had nervous prostration, by which my heart trouble was increased so badly that I had to lie down most of the time. My stomach also gave out, and I had continual and intense pain from the back of my neck to the end of my backbone. In 14 weeks I spent $300 for doctor bills and medicines, but my health continued so miserable that I gave up doctering in despair. I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills last winter, and the first box made me feel ever so much better. I have taken the pills since February, with the result of stopping entirely the pain in the spine and in the region of the liver. My stomach is again normal, and the palpitation of the heart has troubled me but three times since I commenced the pills."

An analysis of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills shows that they contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effect of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, all forms of weakness either in male or female, and all diseases resulting from vitiated humors in the blood. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent post paid on receipt of price, (50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50—they are never sold in bulk or by the 100) by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., or Brockville, Ont.

SELF SACRIFICE.

Without a Justifiable Motive It Becomes a Sentimental Vagary.

Young Lanyan, the midshipman, who went down with Admiral Tryon on the Victoria, was a sentimental lad. "You had better jump," cried the admiral to the boy.

"I'd rather stay with you," was the midshipman's reply.

The boy's loyalty to the admiral was pathetic, but it was a barren display of affection. The admiral was right. The lad ought to have jumped and made a resolute effort to save his life. The admiral had weighty reasons for preferring to stay at his post. The midshipman's life was flung away from sheer excess of sentiment.

Equally wasteful and unjustifiable was the zeal of a New Jersey workman, who listened to a lady's frantic appeal for the rescue of her dog, which was floundering in a pond. She fancied that her pet was in extreme danger. The workman plunged into the water and swam out to the dog. There he was suddenly attacked with cramp and was drowned before the lady's eyes. The dog swam ashore and barked from the bank at the rescuer, whose intentions had been misunderstood. It was more than foolish for a man to risk his life for a hysterical lady's pet dog.

Another workman in Brooklyn played a better part. A cry of "Horse run away!" was raised while he was chatting with a friend. A frightened horse was tearing up the street with a wagon behind him, but no driver. Directly in his track was a baby carriage with a sleeping child. The nurse, who had been wheeling the carriage across the street, had been frightened by the outcries of bystanders, and deserting her charge had fled to the sidewalk.

The workman did not hesitate. Springing forward, he caught the animal by the bridle and stopped the horse barely in time to save the child's life. The horse, revolting against capture, reared and made a plunge for liberty. The bridle broke in the workman's hands, and he fell under the horse's feet. In a moment he was trampled to death.

This workman had a wife and children dependent upon him. He undertook a most hazardous feat in attempting to stop the horse by the bridle ends in front of the baby carriage. But although he lost his life and brought calamity upon his household he exhibited singular unselfishness and fortitude. The sight of the sleeping child exposed to a horrible death set his warm heart beating, and generously and impulsively he did the only thing that could have been done for the child's rescue.

That was better than a useless sacrifice of life for a puppy. It was nobler than voluntary suicide with the admiral, who feared a court marshal's probable brand of murderer more than he feared death. Unless self sacrifice have adequate motive and justification for the risks, it becomes a sentimental vagary involving senseless waste of life.—Youth's Companion.

A Model Salesman.

There was an etching hanging in the window of a Broadway store, and in front there was a young woman looking at it admiringly. By and by she went in and asked the clerk who seemed to be in charge of the picture department to show it to her.

"Do you want to buy it?" inquired that gentleman, sharpening a pencil as he spoke.

"I want to see it," replied the young woman with surprise, but commendable firmness.

"Well," drawled the clerk, shutting his pocketknife and favoring the customer with his undivided and somewhat insolent attention. "If you want to buy it, I'm willing to take it out of the window. As for seeing it, you can see it perfectly well from the street. I haven't it in stock, and it's a great deal too much trouble to get it out if you ain't going to buy it. If you are, I'm willing to take it down. It's $2."

The young woman was dumb with surprise. Then she said in soft and polite tones:

"You are too kind. I will not trouble you."

And in the mind of the witnesses there arose a question as to just what the province of an attendant in a store was.—New York World.

A Postal Tube Across the English Channel.

The proposed plan for the postal tube between France and England is to suspend two tubes, each about three feet in diameter, by means of steel cables thrown across the channel, 120 feet above the level of the water. These cables are to be fixed to pillars whose foundations will be the rocky bottom of the channel, each pillar 800 yards from his fellow. If the plan as proposed is consummated, miniature trains, each carrying 500 pounds of mail matter, will run through the tubes.—Yankee Blade.

A Hint for the Busy Man.

A large German tramp steamed into port this morning, with the yellow flag flying at the masthead, causing quite a commotion along the city front. She proved to be the Romulus from Hong-Kong. There was no sickness on board in spite of the yellow flag, and the Captain told Dr. Lawlor he only hoisted it to keep the runners away from the ship. His ruse succeeded, for not a runner went within half a mile of the vessel.—San Francisco Examiner.

LIEUTENANT LOUISA.

By JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

on the top of a painted deal chest of drawers, from which the drawers were missing. These, together with a few household gods—a kettle and saucepan and a torn and discolored fragment of drugget—formed the furniture of the place. Three of the panes of glass in the solitary window were smashed and the holes filled up with what appeared to be fragments of old stuff petticoats.

In this delectable apartment Mrs. Crump lay, and there my doctor attended her. She wanted for nothing that we could provide her, and one evening at Mr. Bruce's I managed to interest him and Mary in the old woman, insomuch that Mr. Bruce not only permitted Mary to visit her, but himself sent to her at various times a quantity of port out of his own cellar. He had his reward.

On Christmas day I was dining at his table, and during dinner Mary found an opportunity to tell me that she had a Christmas present for me upstairs; but she refused, notwithstanding my urgent inquiries, to tell me what it was. I had visions of smoking caps and slippers and other ornamental and useless rubbish that girls usually think appropriate gifts for men. It turned out to be something much more to my liking. I had and have a weakness for old books, and my chambers were almost lined with them.

Mrs. Crump, it appeared, desirous of testifying her gratitude for my little attentions, had commissioned Mary to present to me in her name one of the moldy volumes I had noticed on the chest of drawers. This bibliomania of mine was shared by Mr. Bruce, who had a magnificent collection; but while he issued semi-royal mandates to Quaritch and Torrey, to Ellis and Pickering, I had to content myself with an occasional prize from a bookstall or at a country auction. Mrs. Crump's Christmas present was an old folio copy of Ambrose Pari in fair preservation except as to the old calf binding, which needed repair. I was turning over the familiar leaves and showing Mary some of the least eccentric of the old woodcuts.

"Ha!" said Mr. Bruce, "a copy of old Pari, and a nice clean copy, too. Let me look at it, Mary, and let me have some coffee."

He and I turned over the book together and had some talk about the author. As I was closing it the fly leaf fell to the ground and fluttered to Mr. Bruce's feet. He picked it up and was about to hand it to me when he suddenly exclaimed with some excitement:

"This is extraordinary. Did you not notice this?"

On the fly leaf was written in a straight, stiff handwriting, "Dalrymple Bruce his booke 1790."

We looked at it together in silence for about a minute. Mr. Bruce spoke first.

"Who was your Mrs. Crump? Do you know her maiden name?"

"I know nothing about her—except that she once told me she was in service at Chicksands Priory, in Bedfordshire."

"In what part of Bedfordshire is Chicksands Priory?"

"Really I don't know; my acquaintance with the place is confined to Aspley Guise and Woburn, and it certainly is not in that neighborhood."

"Do you mind my keeping this? I must see Mrs. Crump in the morning and you had better perhaps come with me. Come to my chambers about 11, and we will go together."

I willingly agreed to be with him at the hour named, and the next day accordingly we interviewed Mrs. Crump, who by this time was well enough to be up, though not to be about. Poor old woman! She was quite frightened at Mr. Bruce's somewhat professional method of cross-examination. He, however, elicited the information that her maiden name was Medlock; her father had been a laborer in Lord Ongley's employ at Warden, in Bedfordshire. Her mother's maiden name she did not know. Both her father and mother were dead. They had both died while in service at Chicksands Priory, and were both buried at Warden. She was the only child, and on her parents' decease she had sold the few things they possessed, except two or three books which she had played with as a child and did not like to part with. There was no family Bible among them. There was an old almanac. There they were on the drawers, and we were quite welcome to look at them, or, for that matter, to take them away. The almanac was not among the books on the drawers; it was in her "box." Her box was under the bed, and if we very particularly wanted to see the almanac she would get it for us.

We did want to see that almanac very particularly indeed; but I made Mrs. Crump sit in her chair while I pulled the box out from under the bed and dragged it up in front of her. She opened it, revealing a strange, heterogeneous collocation of articles, whence derived or wherefore treasured only Mrs. Crump—and possibly not even she—could have explained. All three of us, even the dignified Mr. Bruce, too, united in ransacking that veteran receptacle. It seemed as if there was no end of things except the one thing that we wanted. I began to fear that the almanac had gone to the limbo of almanacs, and that we were destined to another and a final disappointment. I took up an aged pair of stays to look underneath them and a dingy pamphlet dropped out of them. I caught up the pamphlet and examined it; it was an almanac of the year 1794. With trembling fingers I turned to the date of the marriage; opposite it, in faded ink, were written the words: "This daye I was united to my beloved Tryphenia—Dalrymple Bruce." I turned to the cover; there was a pocket in it: in the pocket was a folded document. I drew it out and unfolded it, and there, at last, was the long sought marriage certificate that established the Dunedin peerage!

There is not much more to my story. Mrs. Crump—otherwise Lieutenant Louisa—got well, and passed the rest of her days in peace and plenty. My aunt—who is still living—made over to me half her property, with a reversionary interest in the remainder of it. I had a private interview with Mr. Bruce, and he is now my father-in-law; and Mary and I are as happy as a wife and husband can ever expect to be.

THE END.

Playing Circus.

As soon as a circus had been in town the boys began to have circuses of their own and to practice for them. Everywhere you could see boys upside down, walking on their hands or standing on them with their legs dangling over or stayed against house walls. It was easy to stand on your head; one boy stood on his head so much that he had to have it shaved in the brain fever that he had got from standing on it, but that did not stop the other fellows. Another boy fell head downward from a rail where he was "skinning the cat," and nearly broke his neck, and made it so sore that it was stiff ever so long.

Another boy who was playing Samson almost had his left leg torn off by the fellows that were pulling at it with a hook, and he did have the leg of his pantaloons torn off. Nothing could stop the boys but time or some other play coming in, and circuses lasted a good while. Some of the boys learned to turn hand springs; anybody could turn cart wheels; one fellow across the river could just run along and throw a somersault and light on his feet; lots of fellows could light on their backs; but if you had a spring board or shavings under a bank like those by the turning shop you could practice for somersaults pretty safely.—W. D. Howells in Harper's Young People.

Ventilation of Sewers.

Mr. Frederic Barnett, of London, has published particulars of his automatic system for perpetually ventilating and purifying sewers, drains, etc. This comprises the sealing of all existing apertures at the level of the roads and the substitution of pipes connected with the crown of the arch of the sewer or drain. These pipes pass under the footways and are carried up to the roofs of the houses on either side of the road. Some of these pipes would be devoted to the outlet of sewer gas, and the others to the inlet of fresh air, these different duties being secured by variation in the length of the pipes, and also by movable cowls at their tops, those acting as inlet pipes always opposing the wind direction, and the outlet pipes turning the reverse way. The system, which promises efficiency, could not, however, be introduced without great expense and disturbance of the road and footways. An alternative plan, which was proposed some time ago, of ventilating sewers seems to us to meet the difficulty in a cheaper and more convenient manner. By this method the sewers were connected by pipes with hollow columns bearing gas burners. An upward draught was by this means secured, and the air from the sewers was passed through a purifying flame.—New York Telegram.

Shiftlessness.

Living without plans is shiftlessness. Living above plans may be the highest life of faith. The ordinary traveler must look to the beaten track as his guide in journeying, but he who is competent to be an explorer may strike out from the traveled way and be guided by the circumstances of each hour in his action beyond that path. But if a man is to do without the ruts and the finger boards of the common highway he must be able to read the signs of the heavens in order to be sure of his bearings as he journeys. A man has occasion to rely on rules and patterns of conduct unless he has the ability to comprehend and apply principles in every special emergency. Only he who has faith that God has called him to act all by himself in the world is justified in starting out in life not knowing whither he goes; but he can move forward fearlessly.—Sunday School Times.

Trout Fishing at Night.

Do trout feed in the night during the full moon? In answer I would say no. Can you catch them better during the full moon? To this I would also say no. The best time to catch them at night is early in the evening before the moon rises, or after it sets in the morning. Only in the darkest night do trout bite best. They don't feed on the same ground at night that they do in daytime. You will find them in shallow water above a pool or below, where it is best to use a dark fly, and getting close to your fish, make your cast as delicately as in daytime. Never use bait with your flies. I never have had luck with a white miller.—American Angler.

Woman and the Telegram.

A woman never gets over her nervous terror of a telegram. No matter how familiar it may be to her a sudden terror always clutches her as she takes the unopened envelope in her hand and declares that she has "felt in her bones all day that something dreadful was going to happen to her." And by and by, when she gets the courage to open the sinister missive, she looks up at you with a "teary" smile and says: "Tom and Lucy will be here to-night. How glad I am! And how foolish I was! I never will be again." But she will—the very next time.—New York Evening Sun.

Lignum Vitæ Brakes.

It appears that the lignum vitæ, which has been used so successfully abroad for bearings, possesses special value for brake blocks, giving even better results than cast iron. After being cut to the sweep of the wheel it is firmly clamped to the brake shoe. Owing to its extreme hardness the wood wears very slightly and uniformly.—New York Journal.

TELL YOUR FRIENDS.

Hosts of letters have been written, some to the proprietors of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, some to friends, telling of their inestimable value. Here is one from the Hon. Edmund L. Pitts, the late President of the New York State Senate:

"STATE OF NEW YORK, SENATE CHAMBER, ALBANY, March 11, 188[illegible].

I have used ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in my family for the past five years, and can truthfully say they are a valuable remedy and effect great cures. I would not be without them. I have in several instances given some to friends suffering with weak and lame backs, and they have invariably afforded certain and speedy relief. They cannot be too highly commended."

MUSCLE AND VIGOR—A DIFFERENCE.

Many muscular men succumb to fatigues borne with ease by persons far their inferiors in physical strength. Muscle does not imply vigor. In fact, it is not difficult of proof that athletes do not live as long nor enjoy as good health as the average individual who is vigorous—that is to say, whose digestion and sleep are unimpaired, whose nerves are tranquil, and who has no organic tendency to disease. These requisites of vigor are conferred upon those inherently weak, no less than upon those debilitated through wasting disease, by a thorough, persistent course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the leading national tonic, indorsed and recommended by physicians of eminence. It will not endow you with a muscle of a Corbett, but it will infuse energy into your system, and renew the active and healthful performance of its functions. It averts and cures malarial, rheumatic and kidney complaints, and overcomes dyspepsia, constipation, liver trouble and nervousness.

As long as prize fighting pays so much better than preaching, the devil will feel that he still owns the earth.

$100 REWARD $100.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

AN UNSOLVED PROBLEM.

The Derivation of the Word California Has Puzzled all the Etymologists.

The derivation of the word "California" has never been definitely ascertained and settled. Different authorities have given it various origins, but none has as yet found for it a positive origin. Many of the most profound scholars and etymologists of Europe and America have in vain attempted its elucidation. Eminent Greek scholars have supposed it to be derived from the Greek words "Kalaphorneia," signifying beautiful adultery and "Kala-phora-nea," meaning a beautiful young woman or new country.

The early navigators gave its origin as derived from the two Latin words "calida fornax," or in Spanish "caliente fornalla," a hot furnace. This, howeuer, Venegas, the most learned and authentic of the early historians, in his "Natural and Civil History of California," published in 1758, denies and ascribes its origin to accident, or in his own words "possibly to some words spoken by the Indians and misunderstood by the Spaniards."

This latter designation is obviously erroneous, as the word has certainly an origin anterior to the discovery of California. The name first occurs precisely as it is now spelled 24 years before the discovery of the peninsula in a romance published in Spain in 1510 entitled "Sergas of Esplandian, the Son of Amadis of Gaul." This romance was very popular and passed through several editions.

The two following passages quoted from this volume will show how the name occurs: "Know that on the right hand of the Indies there is an island called California very near to the terrestial paradise." And in the next thus: "In the island called California are many griffins, on account of the great savageness of the country and the immense quantity of wild game to be found there."

Grecian mythology had it that the fabulous animal, the griffin, was the offspring of a lion and an eagle. It was supposed to watch over gold mines and all hidden treasure and was consecrated to the sun, whose chariot has been represented by some of the old painters as being drawn by griffins. It is certainly within the scope of probability that some of Cortez's officers had read this popular novel, and considering the name suggestive and appropriate to their new discovery so applied it.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Geographical Joke.

The Japanese are a very polite people, but they sometimes like to play a joke in a roundabout oriental way upon the men of the west. In the days of the second empire Baron Gros was sent to Japan to demand the opening of certain ports to French commerce. Among the rest he named to the Japanese ministers a certain city.

The Japanese functionaries smiled so broadly when he preferred the request that the French embassador asked them to tell him what gave them so much amusement, but instead of answering the Japanese ministers said:

"We will open the port in question, my lord, if France, in her turn, will open a certain port to us."

"What port is that?" asked the Frenchman.

"The port of Liverpool."

"But, your excellencies," laughing, "Liverpool is not a French port, but an English one."

"Yes!" answered the Japanese. "And the port you named to us is not in Japan, but in Corea!"

The French embassador was compelled to admit that the joke was upon him.—Youth's Companion.

Heating by Electricity.

In some of the hotels in the west a system of heat regulation which is certainly novel is carried out. For instance, a guest occupying room 156 asks for heat. The order is transmitted to a particular person, the typewriter of the hotel generally. She goes to a switchboard, and connection is given electrically with that room, allowing heat to pass into it. The occupant of the room is perhaps particular. A hot blooded person wishes merely to keep from freezing; another wants a high temperature. Each can have his wish, for a thermostat with a pointer is on the wall, and the room will keep itself automatically as desired. The regulation is 70 degrees, but it can be departed from as stated.—Hardware.

Consolation For the Ugly.

He—Surely every woman must love a truthful man.

She—I think very much would depend upon the nature of the truth he dealt in. Do you think, for example, that a homely woman could like a man who told her she was ugly?

He—There are no homely women.

She—That will not do to say, even to a homely woman. There is no woman so plain but she thanks heaven that she is not so ugly as some other woman. Unless you have tact, you'd better stick to the truth.—Boston Transcript.

IN LONDON SLUMS

A Famous French Statesman's Night With Thieves and Murderers.

SHAKING HANDS WITH CRIMINALS.

Jules Simon's Description of a Visit to a Notorius Section of England's Capital.

The French papers have published a lively description of a night among the thieves and murderers of London, by Jules Simon, who says: "I never made the acquaintance of an assassin in Paris, but I have known several in London. I don't mean to say that I have been on intimate terms with them—one must never boast—but I have conversed with them and drank with them.

"The assassins and thieves of London are the curiosities of England and of the world," the statesman continues. "They are peerless in their professions, and they are freely exhibited to foreigners.

"At London when you have seen Westminster, St. Paul, the bridges of the Thames, the British museum, etc., the proposal is made to you to pass a night or two among the thieves as a supreme enjoyment. This is a pleasure allowed only a few. On the date fixed you receive letters from a crowd of people requesting the favor of being your shadow, because you have the right to bring a shadow in this curious voyage, and inasmuch as the permission is granted to foreigners only, it is simply as shadows that the English can be presented to their assassins.

"Well, they gave me a guide, a pleasant fellow, to whom I paid a guinea a day for his services. He also received another guinea for invisible beings of an inferior order, who took care of me without being seen, at least by me. My guide told me to leave at the central office my gold, my watch and jewelry. I kept silver only, to pay for drinks. Armed in this way I passed down beyond Fleet street into localities unknown to the nobility and gentry and to the rays of the sun. My guide brought me to a concert saloon crowded with men and women, and they all appeared to be enjoying themselves.

"At the entrance the guide said to me: 'All these people are thieves of different categories. There is not a single murderer here. They take great care when they set out for work to carry no weapon of any sort with them. Several are specialists who devote their talents to a single operation, and who carry it out with extraordinary perfection.' I was introduced to some customers whose names were figuring in the newspapers. We passed through several houses. Some were cafes where comedies were played and where drinking was carried on.

"It appears that after twenty-five years' practice in their profession, the common thieves prefer the drinking saloons, while the assassins frequent the theaters. At the door of one of the latter places my guide said to me: 'The people you are about to see are not assassins with premeditation; but if in the course of an operation they find that murder is necessary for their safety they take a hand in it, but always with regret.' It was at an advanced hour of the night when we reached the final circle of hell. 'Here,' said my guide, 'they are all assassins.' I asked for information in regard to the social position of these gentlemen. 'They have all some other calling,' replied the guide. 'They are potboys, saloon waiters, hotel waiters and employees of different kinds. Some really follow their employment, and only have recourse to murder when exceptionally good chances are offered; the rest are confirmed criminals, and the honest work which they pretend to do is merely a cloak.'

"'But,' said I, 'what is their judicial situation? It is doubtless by that you know them.'

"'There are several categories,' he replied. 'Some are at the present time serving out their sentences. They have obtained tickets-of-leave, which of course are revocable, and generally the rascals conduct themselves tolerably well, because they know that the least offense will send them back to the penitentiary with an addition put on their sentences. Others are known for having formerly served out their terms, and others again for having several times been tried and always acquitted, although guilty in all cases. These rascals could give points to the smartest barristers in legal subtlety. They play a regular game with the police, perhaps as much from the attractions of the game itself as from the benefits to be derived out of it.'

"The ablest and the most celebrated had that triumphant and self possessed air by which we recognize statesmen in a political assembly. My companion was on terms of familiarity, and almost of friendship, with them. One might say that they were both skillful players.

"'Hello,' said he to one, 'in London again?'

"'Yes, governor, and in perfect security. Papers all right and reputation good.'

"'I congratulate you.'

"'Good evening, governor,' said another. 'I'd rather see you here than in court, like last week.'

"'I thought I had you for certain that time.'

"'Loss of time, governor. I know all your cards. You can put me in the dark for a few nights, but as for a conviction never, governor, never!'"

"'I really believe the rascal is right,' said my guide to me. 'When you think you have got him sure he slips out through some creephole or other and bids you good-by.'

"The 'governor' received many invitations to drink, but he refused politely. Nevertheless he drew upon me when occasion required.

"'The fellow that you see coming here now,' said he, 'is a scoundrel who killed two women to rob them of their savings, and after all found only an empty purse. I don't know why they let him out, unless'—and here his reticence was intended to give me to understand that there were profound secrets to which I could not be initiated. 'Shake hands with him and ask him to take a punch.'

"I shook and asked. I entered into conversation with him. There was nothing extraordinary in his remarks.

"Toward the close of this long visit I noticed that my own position was changed. At first I was received coldly. They wondered who I was. Later on they were more courteous, because through my bowls of punch they looked upon me as a rich foreigner. Finally they treated me with a good natured and bantering familiarity. They had me down fine. I was a French detective who had come to study the secrets of the profession in the best school in the world.

"'You are classed at last,' said my guide, in a tone in which one might announce a piece of flattering news. 'This reputation will follow you to Paris.'"

A Thrilling Race For Life.

Let Mr. Tuckett himself describe that thrilling race for life.

"I remember," he writes, "being struck with the idea that it seemed as though, sure of its prey, it wished to play with us for awhile, at one moment letting us imagine that we had gained upon it and were getting beyond the line of its fire, and the next, with mere wantonness of vindictive power, suddenly rolling out on its right a vast volume of grinding blocks and whirling snow, as though to show that it could outflank us at any moment if it chose.

"Nearer and nearer it came, its front like a mighty wave about to break. Now it has traversed the whole width of the glacier above us, taking a somewhat diagonal direction, and now—run, oh! run, if ever you did, for here it comes straight at us, swift, deadly and implacable! The next instant we saw no more. A wild confusion of whirling snow and fragments of ice—a frozen cloud—swept over us, entirely concealing us from one another, and still we were untouched—at least I knew that I was—and still we ran. Another half second and the mist had passed, and there lay the body of the monster, whose head was still careering away at lightning speed far below us, motionless, rigid and harmless."

The danger was over, and the party examined the avalanche at their leisure. It had a length of 3,300 feet, an average breadth of 8,000 feet and an average depth of 5 feet. That is to say, its bulk was 611,000 cubic yards, and its weight on a moderate computation about 450,000 tons.—McClure's Magazine.

Breathe Through Your Nostrils.

Our organism defends itself against microbes by different means and especially by the mucus that is always on the surface of the epithelium, or superficial cell tissue of all the mucus membranes. This mucus is in every case bactericidal, and the mucus of the nose, particularly, has a marked bactericidal action on certain microbes. To anthrax it is especially fatal, as three hours' contact at 38 degrees centigrade with the bacilli and spores of this disease was enough to destroy them. It is found that the greater number of microbes are equally susceptible to the influence of animal mucus.

The air we breathe is freed in the upper air passages and especially in the nasal cavities of most of the solid particles it holds suspended, including the microbes. These microbes, with their spores falling on the mucous surface, would multiply there if it were a favorable neighborhood for them, and in view of the number of these germs it would be an almost perpetually increasing source of infection. Thanks, however to the bactericidal action of the mucus of the nose, it not only acts as a mechanical barrier for particles floating in the air we breathe, but its defensive action is more direct, as it hinders or destroys the vitality of a large number of bacteria.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Artificial Ice.

A successful system of producing artificial ice surfaces has been inaugurated in Paris and is available in large areas at all seasons of the year. As explained, the machinery consists of two ammonia ice machines, driven by two 50 horsepower steam engines. This ice apparatus has pumps which force ammoniacal gas into water cooled condensers, liquefying the gas, which then passes into large reservoirs, where it expands with the production of cold, the same gas being pumped back and used continuously.

In the application of this system for the formation of a skating surface, a rink has been constructed 60 by 130 feet, having a floor of cork and cement, upon this being laid three miles of connected iron pipe; through this pipe circulates a solution of chloride of calcium, an uncongealable liquid, which by passage through spirals in the refrigerating reservoirs is cooled to some 5 to 20 degrees below zero. The water over the pipe is thus kept frozen, and daily sweeping and flooding insure smoothness.—New York Sun.

The Carafe Remains.

Pitchers and water services come and go, but the carafe abides. Cut glass bottles that show jewel colors may be bought with a month's salary of any steady day laborer. Etched glass is easier to handle and a great deal cheaper. Now and then a chip is knocked out of the neck and the bargain hunter can have a $7 bottle at her own price. Every day carafes are bought and sold at the rate of $6 a dozen. Some housekeepers have two on a table and three if the family are heavy drinkers. In Delmonico's the carafes are filled to the neck with boiled water, covered with butter plates and set in the ice-box. This simple practice has made the restaurant as famous for its water as it is for its wines.—New York Letter.

The Rose.

All roses were white in the garden of Eden before the fall, says an old tradition. As Mother Eve strolled in among the flowers she kissed a white rose, and it blushed itself pink. When Eve was driven from the garden of Eden, the rose covered itself with prickles so that no profane hand might pluck its sweets.—New York Ledger.

A PRECIOUS RELIC.

How the Declaration of American Independence is Guarded.

NAMES ALMOST FADED FROM SIGHT.

Gross Carelessness Characterized the Care of the Priceless Document for Many Years.

In one of the corridors of the senate wing of the Capitol is a statue in marble of John Hancock. On the granite pedestal is an inscription which reads, "He wrote his name where all nations should behold it, and all time shall not efface it."

This of course refers to the Revolutionary patriot whose bold chirography appears conspicuously on the Declaration of Independence. The history of that period states that several of the signers, while sympathizing with the colonists in their struggle, were a little timid or hesitating about signing their names, as they would be punished as principals in the revolt in case the revolt be unsuccessful. Not so with Hancock. Grasping a goose quill and using plenty of ink he wrote his name at the top of the column. He wrote so boldly and distinctly that the name of John Hancock was as easily seen as an electric light on a dark night.

Every schoolboy is familiar with Hancock's handwriting, and as one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence the name of Hancock is familiar to a great many people who probably could not give the name of any other of the patriots who signed with him. Hence the sculptor or designer of the statue was led to declare that "He wrote his name where all time shall not efface it."

However true this may be as sentiment, the fact is that Hancock's name is now almost entirely effaced from the Declaration of Independence. It can be seen by the aid of a strong glass, but is so illegible that a stranger to the document or the style of handwriting would have difficulty in reading the name correctly.

Other names attached to the document have faded out entirely, and can no more be read than if they had never been written. Of the sixty or more names which were written, not more than ten can now be read, and they have faded to a pale, sickly color. As to the others, there are faint traces of writing, but nothing in the form of a signature can be distinguished sufficiently to enable any one to read them. Some are only partially obliterated, and by supplying missing characters any one familiar with the document can make out the name which should be there, but no longer is, except in a very indistinct way.

Considering the priceless character of the Declaration of Independence as a historical document, it is astonishing that from the beginning proper care should not have been taken to preserve it from the ravages of time, and at least from misuse. During recent years it has been jealously guarded in the library of the department of state and precautions taken to prevent any further injury. It is now between two large plates of French glass, inclosed in a hard wood case, all of which is hermetically sealed, so as to keep out air and dust. No atmosphere or other influence can now reach the precious document, which in showing "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind proclaimed the reasons for the separation."

The handsome wooden case in which the Declaration is kept is in an upright position, fastened to a latticed partition, with two doors in front opening outward. The doors open only far enough to view the document and exclude the light, except such as admitted by reflection. This is done out of abundance of caution, for it is doubtful if sunlight could affect it in its present condition, yet the present custodians are determined to spare no pains to prevent further damage.

The general belief of visitors to the library is that the fading of the document is probably due to a poor quality of ink used, and that such writing would naturally fade in the course of time. This is only partially true. There have been preserved specimens of colonial penmanship antedating the Declaration of Independence by many years, which are still clear and distinctly legible, and will continue legible for another generation. The present condition of the Declaration is due to misuse. Prior to 1877 it was kept at the interior department, and was guarded with less care than the caveat in the patent for a flour sifter.

No special effort was made to keep it from injury such as is now being done, and in 1876 it was loaned to the Philadelphia Centennial exposition and exhibited in Independence hall. During the Centennial year an attempt was made to take a letter press copy of it, which was successful in extracting much of the color from the writing, and in some places the writing shortly afterward disappeared altogether. It is hardly conceivable that so dangerous an expedient should have been attempted merely to gratify the people who desired facsimiles. It could only damage the original and give no promise that the copies could be satisfactory. It is unlikely that the Declaration of Independence will ever again be placed on exhibition in connection with any event, no matter how important.

By an executive order it is to remain in the state department and will not be loaned for any purpose, no matter how worthy. The custodian believes that there will be no further fading of the document as long as it remains undisturbed, but to him and to every visitor it is a matter of regret that the attempt to make a letter-press copy should have been permitted. It looks worse than some of the manuscripts in the British museum which are three times as old.—Washington Cor. Milwaukee Wisconsin.

His Contempt.

"I remember an occasion when Judge Black got the worst of an encounter with Thad Stevens," said Judge Stevens. "The former was chief justice of Pennsylvania and the other had a case before the court. The chief justice was addressing some remarks to Mr. Stevens, who turned his back and commenced pacing up and down the chamber, to the great annoyance of Judge Black, who thundered out, 'Mr. Stevens, are you trying to show your contempt for this court?' 'No, sir,' was the answer, 'I'm trying to conceal it.'"—Washington Post.

All Alike.

"Hello, Jack! I understand you're engaged."

"I am, old man, to the"——

"Ah, yes, I know. To the dearest, sweetest little woman on earth, the one woman calculated to make you a happy home, the embodiment of your ideal, the dream of your youth."

"Say, old man, how—how did you ever find that out? You—you don't know her, do you?"—Harper's Bazar.

HE PAID THE BILL.

And the Judge Didn't Shoot the Landlord, as He Was Advised.

Two southern planters, one from Alabama and the other from Louisiana, met one day in New Orleans after the war. One, the colonel, had been in the Confederate army, but the other, the judge, from some physical disability, had remained at home and had managed to save a small portion of his fortune from the wreck, enough to live on comfortably in his declining years, but the colonel had lost everything—in fact, was in straitened circumstances. The judge greeted his friend warmly and insisted on the colonel's dining with him, which invitation the latter gladly accepted.

Accordingly, after partaking of a few drinks by way of appetizers at the bar of the St. Charles hotel, they adjourned to a fashionable restaurant. After a preliminary mint julep or so the judge called for the bill of fare, and the waiter quickly complied with his request, placing before that gentleman a menu with a wine list attached, not printed, but written out in a very fine hand. The judge and his friend selected certain dishes and gave a liberal order for wine with every course. The repast over, the judge and the colonel still tarried, discussing old times before the war and disposing of bottle after bottle.

At last, becoming a little confused in their ideas, they concluded to get a carriage and take a ride along the shell road to the old Spanish fort. The judge, before rising, called to the waiter for the bill. The latter, seeing no preparations for departure, thought he meant the bill of fare, which was accordingly brought. The judge solemnly adjusted his glasses and commenced to add it up on both sides, making a total of over $100. The colonel, who during this operation had been nodding off to sleep, was awakened by a loud exclamation from the judge, and on inquiring the reason the latter shouted out in a loud voice, "Extortion, sir!" They have charged us $100 for this little sitting. It is outrageous, and I will not submit to it." The colonel, rising and laying one hand on his friend's breast, said in a persuasive manner: "There is no doubt, judge, that it is a swindle of the deepest dye, but for all that do not dispute the account. Remember, you are a southern gentleman, judge. Pay the bill, but shoot the landlord." Of course, when the judge proceeded to settle, everything was satisfactorily explained, and the judge, colonel, landlord and waiter all "smiled."—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Italian Marriage Brokers.

In Genoa there are regular marriage brokers, who have pocketbooks filled with the names of the marriageable girls of the different classes, with notes of their figures, personal attractions, fortune and other circumstances. These brokers go about endeavoring to arrange connections in the same offhand mercantile manner which they would bring to bear upon a merchandise transaction, and when they succeed they get a commission of 2 or 3 per cent upon the portion, with such extras or bonuses as may be voluntarily bestowed by the party.

Marriage at Genoa is thus oftentimes simply a matter of business calculation, generally settled by the parents or relations, who often draw up the contract before the parties have seen one another, and it is only when everything else is arranged and a few days previous to the marriage ceremony that the future husband is introduced to his partner for life. Should he find fault with her manners or appearance he may annul the contract on condition of defraying the brokerage and any other expenses incurred.—Harrison's Family Magazine.

A Veritable Prize Bag.

The goat has long been regarded as the most omnivorous animal that roams, but modern investigation may rob that sportive animal of its laurels and transfer them to the broad brow of the humble cow. The men at the various slaughter houses and abattoirs have learned to regard the cow's stomach as a veritable prize bag. It is no uncommon occurrence to find the most curious things in it and sometimes there is a vast collection of bric-a-brac in its mysterious folds. An animal recently killed at the west Philadelphia abattoir had a Masonic mark, a door hinge and part of a rat-trap in its stomach, while another had a small medicine bottle and part of a croquet ball.—Chicago Herald.

An Ancient Memorial.

On the side of a hill near Tours, France, so situated that it may be seen for miles in at least two different directions, is a rude figure of a gigantic hammer roughly sculptured in the rocks. It is believed to be a memorial of the victory of Charles Martel (Hammer) over the Saracens, an event which took place in the year 732.

An Old Method of Having "Proof" Read.

In old times printers chained copies of their books outside their offices, and if any passing scholar succeeded in detecting an error he was rewarded according to its magnitude—a cup of wine for a broken letter, a cup of wine and a plate of meat for a turned letter or a wrong font, and a much larger guerdon for an error in grammar.—London Telegraph.

A LUCKY SHOT.

It Saved an Old Rocky Mountain Hunter's Life Five Times.

HEMMED IN FROM EVERY SIDE.

He Took Good Aim, and When Quiet Was Once More Restored He Counted up Five Dead Bodies.

A group of men were sitting on the hotel porch "swapping" yarns. "Some people do not believe in luck; well, I do, and I'll tell you why," said the traveler as he paused and deliberately put his right leg across the knee of his left and glanced pensively down the street. The group pricked up their ears, for the traveler was a famous story teller, and all rightly judged that his remark was but the prelude to the recital of one of his adventures.

"When I was some 15 years younger than I am now," continued the traveler, "I was exceedingly fond of hunting. One fall my love of this sport led me to take a hunting trip in the Rocky mountains. I was ambitious and wanted to add a grizzly bear skin and a few elk heads to my collection of trophies, and incidentally, if it might be, to let daylight through an Indian or two.

"Well, for two weeks I hunted without getting sight of hair or track of elk, bear or Indian, and the thing was beginning to get monotonous, when one afternoon found me traversing the bottom of a deep canyon. I was alone, my guide having remained in camp on account of a sprained ankle. The bed of the canyon was rent with deep fissures and covered with great rocks, and its sides were seamed and cracked. A few stunted shrubs and trees, of the kind the elk is fond of feeding upon, grew along the sides and bottom of the canyon, and I hoped to find some of the animals here cropping the tender twigs. At last, just as I rounded a high point of rocks, I caught sight of an elk, a noble fellow, standing some 10 rods up the canyon with his face toward me. He was nosing the air suspiciously, and I feared that I would not get a shot at him unless I was quick about it. Accordingly I threw my rifle to my shoulder, and taking hasty aim at the broad, flat forehead fired.

"I was totally unprepared for the startling effect of that shot. Almost at the instant my finger pressed the trigger there came a puff of white smoke from behind a rock some 20 rods up on the opposite side of the canyon, and I saw an Indian leap to his feet only to fall back dead, while at the same moment a piercing scream, seemingly coming from directly over my head, caused me to look quickly up. In the midair, with great paws outstretched and long, sharp nails extended, I beheld a mountain lion apparently about to drop on my head. I bounded to one side. As I did so my blood almost froze with horror, for I had jumped directly over a rattlesnake, which now lay not two feet from me, with his head reared ready to strike.

"Before I could make a movement to defend myself from this new danger down upon the snake fell the body of the lion, crushing out its life. The lion rolled over once or twice and then, to my surprise, lay still. I had not had time to recover from the terror and astonishment caused by these startling incidents when my ears were greeted with a terrific bellowing, and looking up the canyon I saw the elk charging down upon me. I whirled about, intending to seek safety in flight, when, to my utter confusion, not a dozen feet away and directly in the path I must pursue if I continued my flight a monster grizzly bear reared himself up on his hind legs and with wide open mouth rushed for me. I was in an awful situation. I could see no possible way of escaping. On the right hand was the perpendicular wall of the canyon and on the left a deep chasm. Before was the grizzly bear and behind the rushing elk. Death faced me whatever way I turned. I trust I may never feel the horror of that moment again. The grizzly bear sprang forward to seize and crush out my life with his strong arms, and the elk gave a mighty bound, his huge horns lowered ready to transfix my body.

"At that moment my heart seemed to sink into my boots, and I fell flat upon the ground. With a crash like that of the collision of two locomotives, the animals met over my prostrate form. The terrific momentum of the elk bore himself and the bear over my body. For about five seconds there was a tremendous struggle; then both beasts fell, locked together, to the ground, and in a moment more had expired. One of the sharp prongs of the horns of the elk had pierced the heart of the grizzly, and the elk's neck had been broken by the bear in his death struggle. I bounded to my feet, not knowing whether to run or stand still, so sudden, so terrible and so many had been the dangers which had threatened me. But everything was quiet, and all my foes were dead.

"On investigation I found that my rifle ball had struck the elk at the base of the horns, where the bone is thick and hard, and after partially stunning him had glanced diagonally across the canyon and pierced the brain of the Indian, who, concealed behind a rock, was about to fire upon me. The shock of the ball had been sufficient to deflect the aim of the Indian enough to cause him to miss me and to pierce the heart of the mountain lion just at the moment he sprang upon me from a cleft in the rocks above my head. The lion landed upon the rattlesnake and crushed the life out of him before he had had time to strike, and the elk and the bear in their eagerness to kill me had destroyed each other.

"I call that a lucky shot, at least for me, because it saved my life five times and was the death of an Indian, a grizzly bear, an elk, a rattlesnake and a mountain lion."

And the traveler deliberately removed the right leg from the knee of the left and glanced upward with the look of a man who is confident that he is a favorite of Providence.—Chicago Tribune.

The Hygiene of the Barber's Shop.

Dr. A. Blaschko has published a paper on the hygiene of the barber's shop, in which he enumerates the diseases which may be contracted in the barber's chair, either directly from the barber or indirectly from his instruments and appliances. His list contains herpes tonsurans, impatigo contagiosa, acne verioliformis, trichorrhexis nodosa, impetiginous eczema, acute eczema, alopecia areata, syphilis, tuberculosis and last, but not least, cholera, the infection of which, he thinks, might be conveyed by a napkin which had been used for wiping the face of a person who was suffering from or recovering from cholera.

The implements of the barber's craft, which, in Dr. Blaschko's opinion, may carry infection, are napkins and towels, the razor itself, the shaving brush—which may itself in its own proper hairs suffer from trichorrhexis nodosa, sponges, powder puffs, combs and brushes. The list of diseases is long and alarming, but to it may be added perhaps typhoid fever, which it has been thought has sometimes been contracted by leaning over a basin with an improperly trapped wastepipe during the process of shampooing. That there is very real danger of catching skin diseases unless the barber is very cleanly in all his arrangements and appliances is undoubtedly true, and the immediate cause of Dr. Blaschko's paper appears to have been an epidemic in Berlin of a disorder to which Saalfeld applied the term "dermatomycosis tonsurans."—British Medical Journal.

The Hairbrush.

The right sort of a hairbrush used on the scalp two or three times a day will remove every perceptible trace of dandruff. The scalp needs care, and to reach it the hair should be cut with the comb at intervals of extreme proximity so as to bristle every portion of skin and brush away the scurf. The only brush that will go through thick hair is the metal woven brush, which, however, is not to be recommended unless the desire is to produce baldness. What is known in trade as the barber brushes are the best, of which the unbleached and undyed boar's bristle is first choice.

It is a mistake to buy a black brush. Even if the bristles are not dyed the color conceals the dirt, and a dirty brush will not clean the head. If the bristles are dyed, they will have lost some of their firmness, and instead of going through the hair or scraping the scalp they will bend under pressure. A woman's hairbrush should have bristles not more than half an inch long, unbleached, white preferred, and stiff enough to scratch but not irritate the scalp. It should be hand sewed. The points should present an irregular surface to correspond with the elevations and depressions of the scalp. Such a brush, wood bound, cannot be bought for much less than $3.—New York World.

Where He Was Stumped.

"You missionaries," said the captious critic, "pay altogether too much attention to getting the heathen to wear white folks' clothes, and making them cut their hair short, and all that sort of thing."

"Mebbe we do," said the good man meekly.

"You bet you do. Why don't you devote your time to teaching them how wicked it is to take advantage of their brethren at every chance? Why don't you pay more attention to teaching them not to rob, lie and steal?"

"Well," answered the missionary slowly, "if I talk to them in the way you would have me to, they are sure to ask me if the white men are not in the habit of doing the very things you are condemning so, and as I could not lie to them about it I think it best that these things be not mentioned more than is necessary."—Indianapolis Journal.

A Lasso of Human Hair.

The most grewsome relic in the United States, if not in the whole world, is in the possession of "Old Le Pier," a Spanish Indian, living on the Wenachee river at the point of its junction with the Upper Columbia. Old Le Pier's odd souvenir is nothing more or less than a lasso, or lariat, composed wholly of human hair. It is over 50 feet in length, and as variegated in color as was the coat of "Joseph of old." The priests (none but the mission clergy are ever allowed to even get sight of it) say that no less than 50 women and girls must have been scalped to furnish material for this horrid rope, the black, brown, yellow, red and gray hair being curiously and intricately woven into a rope that is strong enough to hold an ox, horse or buffalo.—St. Louis Republic.

German Cutlery Grinders.

The German cutlery grinder is a very superior workman, and in razors he has not a peer. The English workman will not spare the time to do the work as well; consequently the blanks are sent to the German from Sheffield to grind. The English stand over the work, the stone being set low. On the other hand, the German has his stone right before his face and can see his work very closely. His touch is very delicate, and he can grind a blade as thin as a sheet of paper and make the best razor in the world.—Hardware.

Senator William M. Stewart has recently issued a consummately able book on "Silver and the Science of Money." In conjunction with Senator John P. Jones this able Nevadan has thrown a great deal of light on our monetary affairs. The process of education on the silver question is going on very rapidly both in this country and in Europe. It is usual to assume that England and Germany are in favor of the single gold standard. This is a misstake. Many of the cleverest men in both countries are unreservedly friendly to silver and desire to see it remonetized. Senator Jones' speech on the repeal of the purchasing clause of the silver act and this work of Stewart's are simply unanswerable. It is a remarkable circumstance that so small a State should have two such supremely able representatives in the upper House of Congress. They have both been impelled by their consciences to drop the grand old party and it is greatly to be doubted whether there are two abler men left in its ranks They have, in season and out, enforced the lesson with irresistable eloquence that prosperity will be restored to the United States and to the world when silver is remonetized and not before

The passage of the amendment to the Queen's speech through the House of Commons by a small vote to abolish the House of Lords is significant of the storm that is brewing among the British people against the hereditary branch of the English Legislature. If the upper house is made elective, a number of peers will be returned to that chamber, for there are very able and intellectual men amongst them; but the great majority of them will be supplanted by material taken from the leading men of the country not belonging to the nobility. Literature and the arts, manufactures and commerce will be well represented in the new order of things; whilst the lordlings who are only famous for their vices and mental mediocrity will sink into their natural obscurity.

It is a significant sign of the rapid revolution that is taking place on the silver question that the merchants in London engaged in the East India and China trade have, through the chamber of commerce, represented to the Government the urgency of reassembling as soon as possible the international monetary conference. England is beginning to feel acutely the evil effects of silver demonetization. The merchants trading with silver using countries have been convinced by the practical losses they have been subjected to. When the blizzard of repudiation of bonds payable in gold by silver producing countries has fairly struck the financial target in the center then a great howl for bimetallism will go up from the stock exchange and Lombard street. Silver has seen its darkest hour.

The greatest loss the Democratic party has met in years has just been announced. It consists of the withdrawal from Democracy's ranks of J. Hampton Hoge. This person, who has joined the Republicans, was appointed by Mr. Cleveland to represent this country at Amoy, but fell by the wayside and remained drunk for some weeks at San Francisco. Mr. Cleveland recalled him, withdrew his commission and appointed a gentleman to the place. Hoge has withdrawn his support from the party on this account and says he will smash it to flinders at the next election.

It is to be hoped that the Portuguese government will surrender De Gama and his misguided associates to the Brazilian authorities. An example made in their case would have a beneficial tendency in smothering the ambitious aspirations of men of this type, who have been resposible for most of the trouble in the South American Republics The execution of this piratical outfit may have a most salutary effect on the rising generation.

Representative Caminetti has induced the House to favor an appropriation to establish a rice culture experimental station on the overflowed tule land at the junction of the San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers. There is little doubt that rice can be successfully grown in the submerged tule lands, and if the industry is successfully inaugurated those lands would become valuable and their cultivation would give employment to a great number of people.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

WEDNESDAY March 21, 1894.

Estate of Schuyler Williams, deceased—Filed final account and petition for distribution of estate.

Estate of James B. Steward, deceased—Filed final account.

THURSDAY, March 22, 1894.

Baxter et al. vs. Gilbert et als.—Filed findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Bar silver, 59¼.

E. H. Edwards of Lone Pine was in town to-day.

W. K. Miller spent a couple of days in town this week.

The hotels at Independence are crowded with visitors.

The Independence public school term will close April 13th.

Wm. McDonald and R. W. Thomas were down from Big Pine last Sunday.

Mrs. A. Church went to Keeler on Wednesday, returning yesterday morning.

Wm. Arcularius arrived from Mojave on Wednesday with a 12-animal team loaded with freight.

T. C. Boland is expected to arrive home on the next stage from Mojave. His health has greatly improved.

Mrs. Bishop, whose husband was a former section boss at Laws, died at San Francisco last week of cancer.

T. E. De La Matyr of Bishop accompanied by his wife and brother, went south by stage yesterday to Mojave.

There were five passengers on Wednesday's stage from Mojave to Keeler and seven went out yesterday morning.

Bert. Rhine went to Big Pine last Monday. There's a chance for Bert. to be a good man yet; he is about to become a Benedict.

D. C. Lane, one of the proprietors of the Sorba mine at Darwin, arrived at Keeler Wednesday evening from a visit to Los Angeles.

E. Robinson started for Los Angeles with his beef cattle on Wednesday. They are as fine a lot of steers as can be found in any country.

Mrs. A. O. Collins and Miss Leora Collins went south on Wednesday on their way to Los Angeles, where they will visit about a month.

Independence was struck last Sunday by two phonographs and a footrace, not to mention a few minor incidents. Who says we are not in it?

The remains of James W. Smith, a former Sheriff of this county, will be removed from Bishop and reinterred in the Masonic cemetery at Independence.

Mrs. Emma Jiggens and her little son, Harry, are visiting with Mrs. Barnes at Keeler, having recently returned from an extended visit with relatives at Detroit.

Vincent Borel returned to Big Pine yesterday. He says that owing to lack of rain feed is very scarce on the other side of the mountains and the sheep men will soon be coming into this Valley.

Work on the big canal progresses as usual. There will be a large increase of force within a week or two as it is the purpose of the company to push the work on the first section with all possible speed.

Mr. and Mrs. Neil McLain were up from Keeler early in the week. Mr. McLain has taken a contract to complete the Georges Creek section of the big canal and will soon have a force of men and horses at work.

Chas. Richel of Los Angeles was a passenger on yesterday's train to Bishop. Mr. Richel controls a tract of fine land south of Bishop which he intends to improve during the coming season and he will spend several months in the Valley for that purpose.

About three car-loads of concentrates are being shipped from Cerro Gordo every week by T. C. Boland. J. V. Skinner is hauling ore from Modock and Neil McLean will bring in a load of ore from the Sorba mine next week.

FOR SALE!

Or will trade for cattle, 500 head No. 1 Stock and Range Horses, Mares, Stallions, and four highly bred Kentucky Jacks.

A DECISION.

TEXT OF JUDGE GILL'S FINDINGS IN THE BIG WATER SUIT.

A Matter of the Greatest Interest to Land Owners In Inyo County.

Yesterday Judge Gill filed his decision in the case of John Baxter and E. Robinson, plaintiffs, vs. A. D. Gilbert, O. I. Mairs, A. F. Mairs, John A. Lank, Thomas Kehoe, William L. Hunter, Executor of the estate of John A. Hannah, deceased, and the Independence Water Co., defendants. The decision is in favor of the plaintiffs and, with the findings of fact, covers thirty three pages of type-written paper, and is the most elaborate decision ever filed in our Superior Court. Plaintiffs win on the ground of being riparian proprietors and appropriators. The Independence Water Co. is allowed 20 inches out of the combined waters of Little Pine and Pinyon creeks; of the remainder Robinson gets one-half, Baxter one-third and Lank, Kehoe and Hunter one-sixth. Baxter also gets title to that portion he has used of the waters which overflow the banks of Little Pine creek into the "Wash," or north branch of Little Pine creek. The one-sixth decreed to Lank, Kehoe and Hunter is to be divided between them as follows: For the Reddy place, 35 inches; Lank & Kehoe place, 15 inches, Hannah place, ten inches.

The decision further cites: "That neither the defendants, A. D. Gilbert, O. I. Mairs, or A. F. Mairs, have any right to divert any of the waters of said Little Pine creek or Pinyon creek, or any of the waters of the lakes, creeks, or springs in these findings mentioned as forming the source of said Little Pine creek, and that the acts of the defendants alleged in the second amended complaint is this action, in attempting to divert and in diverting the waters of Little Pine creek and Pinyon creek, and in making the cuts into said lakes, and into the bank of said Little Pine creek, were without right, wrongful and unlawful."

"That the cross-complainant, O. I. Mairs, is not entitled to the use or enjoyment of any of the waters that flow within the banks of said Little Pine creek or said Pinyon creek except such water, if any, as may naturally flow through or upon his said lands after all the rights of the plaintiffs herein, and the defendants, Lank, Kehoe, and the estate of Hannah, and the Independence Water Co., have been fully satisfied."

"That plaintiffs are entitled to their costs in this action against the defendants and cross complainant, to be apportioned as follows: Against the defendants A. D. Gilbert, A. F. Mairs and O. I. Mairs, seven-fifteenths; against the cross-complainant, O. I. Mairs, five-fifteenths; against defendants Lank, Kehoe, and William L. Hunter as executor of the estate of John A. Hannah, deceased, two-fifteenths, and against the defendant, the Independence Water Co., one fifteenth."

Much interest has been taken in this suit by the public, as nearly every stream in Owens Valley is situated somewhat similar to Little Pine creek. Eight attorneys appeared in the suit. P. Reddy and P. H. Mack were the plaintiffs' attorneys and General Clarke, Judge Beardman, P. W. Forbes, P. W. Bennett, W. A. Lamar and J. D. Lewis appeared for the various defendants.

The Tables Turned.

The footrace between Ed. Ober and Tom Taylor for $500 a side came off last Sunday according to programme. For several days the town had been kept in a fever of excitement and when the men appeared on the track stripped for the race interest was wrought up to the highest pitch. The track had been kept wet and scraped all the morning and was in fine condition. The men broke on the third score and Ober led from start to finish, winning easily by ten feet. The track was exactly 100 yards long, with 5½ feet fall, and the race was run in ten seconds. The large crowd assembled, while enthusiastic over the winner, was very orderly and no disputes or wrangles followed. Taylor's conduct was that of a true sportsman. He bet his money as long as it lasted and accepted his defeat philosophically. It is said that he and his partner, a man named Akers, lost $1,600. About $4,000 in cash changed hands at Independence on the result of the race, besides horses, watches etc. There was also considerable betting at Hawthorne and other towns. Ober is a very fast man and he will be backed here to the extent of $5,000 that he can beat any and all comers.

G. P. Rixford writes that the large map of Inyo county has been received and will be placed in position at the Mid-winter Fair immediately. Mr. Rixford says that a good display can yet be made and urges upon the people of Inyo the great benefits that arise from it. He offers to take charge of all articles intended for exhibition and see that they are put in proper place free of charge for his own services. The local committee proposes taking action at once regarding the matter.

On Tuesday evening a party arrived at Independence from Los Angeles. In the party were Frederick Stock and wife, R. H. Knight, Walter Maxwell and Charles Brochen of Los Angeles, and Mr. Browning and wife from England. Messrs. Stock and Knight came here on business connected with the big canal, the others to see the country. The party left here yesterday evening for Lone Pine, on their way back to Los Angeles.

Observer Jenkins of the signal service station at Keeler received a general order on Wednesday from the Department at Washington looking to the abandonment of the station at Keeler. Mr. Jenkins does not know whether or not the station will be discontinued altogether in Owens Valley, or whether it will be transferred to some point nearer Wt. Whitney. He is looking for further instructions at an early date.

The unusual cold wave predicted by Foster to occur between the 15th and last of March struck the Valley last Saturday and continued several days. Over a month ago the storm was predicted and farmers and stockmen warned. According to the same authority this will be the last cold storm of the season.

Several car-loads of hay will be shipped from Alvord to Independence for use on the canal.

"German Syrup"

My niece, Emeline Hawley, was, taken with spitting blood, and she became very much alarmed, fearing that dreaded disease, Consumption. She tried nearly all kinds of medicine but nothing did her any good. Finally she took German Syrup and she told me it did her more good than anything she ever tried. It stopped the blood, gave her strength and ease, and a good appetite. I had it from her own lips. Mrs. Mary A. Stacey, Trumbull, Conn. Honor to German Syrup. 6

A VERY BUSY WOMAN.

She pronounced in sounding platitude
Her universal gratitude,
For men of every latitude,
From the tropics to the poles;
She felt a consanguinity,
A sisterly affinity,
A kind of kith-and-kinity,
For all those foreign souls.

For Caledonian highlanders,
For brutal South Sea islanders,
For wet and moist and dry landers,
For Gentile, Greek and Jew;
For Finns and for Siberians,
For Arabs and Algerians,
For Terra del Fuegians,
She was in a constant stew.

Oh, it worried Miss Sophronia
Lest the men of Patagonia
Should die with the pneumonia,
With the phthisis or the chills.
Yes, indeed, she worried daily,
Lest a croup or cold should waylay
Some poor Soudanese or Malay,
Dying for the lack of pills.

And she toiled on without measure,
And with most unstinted pleasure,
For the good of central Asia
And the pagan people there.
But meanwhile her little sister
Died of a neglected blister,
But Sophronia hardly missed her,
For she had no time to spare.
—Hudson Gazette.

Came High With a Grip.

A correspondent tells of a unique experience at a hotel where he stopped once for dinner:

There sat next to me a prominent member of the local community—one of those whose capacious maw has extensions attached running down into his legs. For the first 10 minutes I tried to keep up with my fellow diner, but was distanced in no time. I gave up the race and sat down to watch my rival gorge himself, and he did it to perfection. Everything went, from soup to pie, and some of them went several times. Finally his vacuum was filled, and the farmer passed out to the desk, where he planked down a quarter.

"Thank you, said the fresh country lass who was officiating as banker.

I came next and put up the same ante as my farmer companion had.

"Half dollar," said the maiden as she shook her head at the coin I had tendered.

"What for? The farmer sat right by me, ate three times as much as I did and only paid a quarter. Why do I have to pay a half dollar?"

The query was evidently one too many for the girl, for she turned to the washroom and bawled out:

"Paw, this man wants to know why you charge him half a dollar and only charge farmers a quarter."

"Paw" emerged from the lavatory, evidently bent upon having a row, but the limpidness of my Carter's-jet-black-when-you-write-ink eyes melted his anger, and he approached me very gently.

"You had a grip, didn't you?"

"Yes, I did, but I carried it up from the depot myself."

"That don't make no difference. Can't no man with a grip eat in this house for less than half a dollar."—Nebraska State Journal.

A Cinch.

She fastened her gaze upon the hard, unpitying face of the hired girl.

"And it is true," she faltered, "that you love—my—my—husband?"

Scarcely breathing, she awaited the answer.

"I do."

"And—and"——

Her voice sank to a whisper. In her agitation she trembled violently.

——"can you not be induced to give him up?"

"Never."

"Then"——

Upon the instant her demeanor changed. She was transformed into a triumphant being.

——"I shall insist that you rise at 5 o'clock in the morning, summer and winter; that you take but one afternoon a week to yourself; that you get supper Sunday night; that you replace all dishes you break and build fires without kerosene."

The domestic implored for mercy, but met only jubilant obduracy.—Detroit News-Tribune.

Couldn't Understand It.

Farmer Hardfist—What under the sun is the reason that boys are such no account critters nowadays? Here is our son Jasper pretty nigh crazy to leave the old farm and try to git a job in town.

Mrs. Hardfist (meekly)—Perhaps he thinks the work won't be quite so hard.

Farmer Hardfist—Work? Why, shucks, Polly, he don't skurcely know what work is! He hain't done a thing since supper but milk the cows, feed the horses, slop the hogs, split and carry in the wood and kindlins, shell a little corn, ketch the colt and turn the grindstone for me about half an hour. He's had all the rest of the time to himself, except a few minutes it took him to mend the bridle I broke this mornin. What in the name o' Tunkett makes all the boys so crazy to leave the old farm?—Life.

A Cautious Parent.

Mrs. Gabb (hostess)—Your little son does not seem to have much appetite.

Mrs. Gadd—No, he's quite delicate.

Mrs. Gabb—Can't you think of anything you'd like, my little man?

Little Man—No'm. You see, mam made me eat a hull lot before we started, so I wouldn't make a pig of myself.—Tit-Bits.

Waiting.

There's a young lawyer in Detroit whose reputation for prompt pay is not the best. A friend called on him the other day to have him go out with him.

"I can't go right now," he said, "but if you will wait until I come back I'm yours."

"Where are you going?"

"Around to my tailor's to pay a bill."

The friend began to button up his overcoat.

"Thanks," he said. "I guess I'll not wait. I've got to get to my place before next summer."—Detroit Free Press.

SAVED.

And All Due to the Chance Remark of a Passenger.

The bleak winds howled through the mountain gorges and drove the snow in blinding clouds that eddied and swirled among the tree tops and down the steep declivities and hid from sight the yawning chasms, the rocky cliffs, the dizzy precipices and the seams and gashes that marred the face of the rent and rugged landscape. Puffing and panting up the grade, its cloud of smoke and steam mingling unseen with the frosty breath of the storm king, came the engine that pulled the lightning express with its load of west bound passengers. Along the mountain side, now rumbling over the iron trestles spanning some fathomless gorge and anon plunging through some cavernous snowshed that stretched its protecting roof over the lines of steel which marked the mighty transcontinental highway, sped the train of palace cars. And the wind blew in gusty squalls and roared as if in savage glee at the helplessness of man arrayed in conflict with the forces of nature.

At a lonely station near the summit the train came to a sudden halt.

The door of the forward passenger coach was thrown violently open, and five or six gigantic ruffians, armed to the teeth, strode inside.

"The first man that moves a finger," said the leader of the gang in a deep, hoarse voice, "is a dead man!"

Half way down the car a lady whose hearing was imperfect had been engaged in an animated conversation with a fellow traveler. She had not noticed the stoppage of the train, and in the stillness that followed the harsh command of the train robber her voice rose clearly and distinctly.

"Last October," she said, "when I was at the World's fair"——

With howls of rage and despair the murderous villains turned in their tracks, fled with frantic, desperate haste, and in a moment had vanished in the raging storm outside. The train was saved!—Chicago Tribune.

It Was a Hit.

A boy sat on one of the window seats in the postoffice corridor yesterday reading a novel, while his bootblacking outfit furnished a rest for his feet. By and by a severe looking man who was strolling about noticed him and halted to ask:

"Boy, are you reading a novel?"

"Yes, sir."

"I thought so. Getting yourself ready to enter a career of crime?"

"No, sir."

"But that will be the inevitable result. It's an Indian story, I suppose?"

"No, sir."

"Some trashy detective yarn then?"

"No, sir."

"Then there's a boy in it who runs away from home and performs heroic and unheard of deeds?"

"No, sir. It's about a bootblack right in this town. He got his first start in life by a gentleman coming up to him in this very place and giving him 50 cents to black his shoes."

"Ah—um! Man was a fool!" growled the philanthropist as he trotted along and left the lad to take the broad and narrow path to the gallows.—Detroit Free Press.

A Model.

Auntie—Maggie, my dear, you're a deal too flighty. You make eyes at the young men as you pass. Why don't you take pattern by me?

Maggie—So I do, Aunt Debbie. They say I'm just what you were at my age.—Fun.

HELPING OTHERS.

If there be some weaker one,
Give me strength to help him on:
If a blinder soul there be,
Let me guide him nearer thee:
Make my mortal dreams come true
With the work I fain would do;
Clothe with life the weak intent,
Let me be the thing I meant;
Let me find in thy employ
Peace, that dearer is than joy;
Out of self to love be led,
And to Heaven acclimated,
Until all things sweet and good
Seem my nature habitude.
—J. G. Whittier.

AN IMITATION WIFE.

I had adjusted my tie, taken up my hat and was preparing to leave when the door slowly opened and my mother came in.

"Going out, are you Tom?" said she.

"Yes."

"Where—to another party?"

"Yes."

"That makes three this week, doesn't it, Tom?"

"Yes. We're hurrying to get through. Going to take Miss Beaufort tonight, and then I'm done with the Jolly club's parties.

Mother somehow or other didn't seem to think very much of what I said.

"Tom, I wish you would get married," she said, with a troubled face. "I believe you would stay at home more."

"Well, I am awful tired, mother, and completely worn out."

"Then why don't you quit it?"

"The best reason in the world, mother. I am neither engaged nor in love, but am willing to be both."

It was getting late so I started after this, but the sad look on my mother's face set me to thinking. My mother is the best woman in the world, even if I do say it myself, and I felt worried about her. She was right. I was out nearly every evening—this evening at a reception, next time at a ball, then a theater party and so on.

Of course I could well afford it, for my salary as cashier at Hart's was a liberal one. But I was not saving a penny, and my home folks never saw me except at the table. Even poor old patient mother was complaining.

But I was having lots of fun. There was that Beaufort girl—she was a fine one. Could dance any dance, talk about anything and make you have the finest time in the world.

Then there was Vene Wright. She would play a game with a fellow, go rowing, skating—anything for fun. Then, Vene had money; that was an important item. Why shouldn't I tackle Miss Vene on the subject of matrimony?

"Thomas, old son," said I to myself, "Vene is the one."

But Vene somehow or other did not exactly suit the case, and my mind reverted to Miss Beaufort, who was smart, pretty, stylish and suited better, but I knew nothing about her financial standing. This was an important matter to me in those days.

Meanwhile the carriage approached Miss Beaufort's. I had never been there before, and to my surprise found it to be a very unpretentious house. I confess I was disappointed. I expected to drive up to an elegant mansion, be ushered into a fine reception room by a servant in livery and there await the coming of Miss Beaufort. Then I expected to make a bold dash for her heart—propose, and possibly be accepted or declined by the time the party was over.

But not so. A little lady with gray hair opened the door, and she was introduced to me by Miss Beaufort as "mamma." Miss Beaufort was ready and waiting, so we walked out to the carriage.

"Mr. Silver," said she after we had seated ourselves, "don't you think there is a great amount of snobbery in society and lots of downright foolishness?"

"Well, yes," said I.

"For instance," said she, "here is an elegant carriage that you have brought for me, and yet the party is not half a mile away."

This certainly was very refreshing. I had actually squandered one pound to have this carriage for the evening, and she was not pleased with it. I know Vene would have enjoyed a ride in it.

"Mr. Silver," she remarked again, "this is the last party I am going to this winter."

"Well, why?" said I. "Aren't you going to take in the German club ball and the others?"

"No," said she. "Mamma hasn't the money; she can't afford it. Besides, Mr. Silver," she continued, "can you really afford to spend so much money on society?"

I looked at her. There was honesty fairly shining out of her pretty black eyes, even if she wasn't very polite, so I answered her honestly:

"No, Miss Beaufort, I cannot! I haven't saved a penny this winter, and I get a big salary too. It seems idiotic."

"I have met you so frequently I feel quite well acquainted with you, though I expect I have been a little impolite."

"No," said I. "I am glad that you take that much interest in me."

Then we changed the subject. I had a splendid time at the party and enjoyed Miss Beaufort's company very much. I found her level headed and bright, if she was too frank.

The next day I told mother about it. She said she admired Miss Beaufort for her common sense, though she had never seen her. Then she referred again to my getting married.

"Suppose," said she, "that you pretend for a week or so that you are married and see how it goes?"

"An imitation wife," said I.

"Why not?" she said. "I will write the name of a young lady on a card, seal it in an envelope and you can lock it in your desk. Then let us suppose you are married to her for say two weeks. During that time I want you act just as if the lady were here in person and your lawfully wedded wife."

"Whose name are you going to write on the card?" said I.

"Never mind," said she. "I will write my preference and neither of us will breathe a word about this to a living soul."

We agreed on this. Mother wrote the name on the card and sealed it in the envelope. I knew it was Vene Wright's name, so I decided to imagine that Vene was there in person, and so we commenced the week.

Monday night came. That was the night of the German club ball; but I staid at home and talked to mother. Then I played drafts with her for awhile, and we managed to have a very enjoyable evening.

Next morning mother met me at the table with smiles and about the best breakfast I had eaten for a long while.

"You must imagine that your wife saw to this breakfast," she whispered.

Going to the city this morning who should get into the 'bus but Miss Beaufort. I bowed to her gracefully, passed her fare to the conductor, and was about to sit down by her side when I happened to think of my imitation wife at home and kept my seat by the door.

"Married men have no business talking to the young ladies," said I to myself.

Miss Beaufort looked at me rather queerly, but said nothing, and I thought the 'bus would never get to the city.

Thursday was the evening I was to call on Vene, and I forgot to send her an excuse. On Friday a note came from her, which mother took the liberty of opening, as she thought I would not care, and she felt like representing my wife in the desk. It was a tender missive, and somewhat surprised me when I saw it. But what could I do? Married men have no business getting tender notes from young ladies. Inasmuch as I had contracted to carry out mother's plan for two weeks, I left the note for mother to answer. She is a very truthful woman, but in answering the note she prevaricated.

She said that I was very sick, and as a natural consequence Vene called that afternoon to see me, but I was at business, and mother had to invent another story. Then she had to come all the way to the office so as to keep me from coming home my usual way for fear Vene might catch us.

I laughed a good deal at mother, and Vene did not find us out, but Mrs. Jones—an awful gossip—met her, and Vene told her I was sick, and the next day all my society friends came round, among them Miss Beaufort.

Mother met her rather coldly, but invited her to stay awhile.

"I suppose Mr. Silver is almost worn out with so much going out" said the young lady.

"He is much better," said mother, "but I do not think he will go out for several weeks. I think that I shall keep him at home."

"I am so glad," said Miss Beaufort; "not that you are going to keep him at home, but that he is not going out so much. I am getting so that I fairly detest society. Here was a woman who had my mother's views, and they both thereupon had a confidential talk and pleased each other mightily.

Then she asked the mater to call on her mother, which she did.

Meanwhile I was staying at home every evening and was getting pretty tired of it, as the two weeks were drawing to a close.

"Don't you think a man ought to take his wife out once in a while?" said I to mother.

"Why not?" said she.

"Then I'll take her to the theater tonight." So I took a couple of reserved seats at Drury Lane theater for the following night, and mother, who represented my wife, went with me.

We had hardly taken our seats before I noticed that they were adjoining those of Miss and Mrs. Beaufort.

We went home together that night and laughed and talked a good deal.

I think mother told Mrs. Beaufort what we had been doing, but I did not hear it. I know that several days later, after my two weeks of married life were over, I went to call on Miss Beaufort. We had a pleasant time together, and just as I was about to leave the old lady came in.

"I forgot to ask you, Mr. Silver, what you thought of married life," said she.

Miss Beaufort looked horrified, but laughed.

"Mother has been telling you, has she?" said I.

"She has," said she.

"Well," said I, "during the two weeks I was married I read three good books, gained four pounds in weight, saved £5 10s., besides paying mother for my wife's board and the tickets to Drury Lane."

"And who were you married to?" asked Miss Beaufort.

"I forgot to look," said I. I hurried home to see who my wife had been. The envelope was just as I had placed in in my desk drawer. I tore it open, and there was the name of Miss Beaufort.

"Well," said I, "mother made her an imitation wife, now I will try to make her a real one."

And so I did.—New York Mercury.

Matching Teeth.

Perhaps the greatest difficulty that dentists meet with is the matching of false teeth with the natural teeth of their customers. The tooth factories supply dentists with rings upon which are strung thin short metal bars, each carrying a tooth at its extremity. There are twenty-five of these sample teeth that run all the way from nearly white to a shade that is almost olive. Some one of the twenty-five usually almost matches the patient's natural teeth, and, at any rate, enables the dentist to match the teeth by application at the factory.—New York Sun.

Animals That Do Not Drink.

Darwin states in his "Voyage of a Naturalist" that unless the huanacoes, or wild llamas of Patagonia, drink salt water, in many localities they must drink none at all. The large and interesting group of sloths are alike in never drinking. A parrot is said to have lived in the Zoological gardens, Regent park, for fifty-two years without a drop of water.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Just as Good.

"I should think you'd miss your watch dreadfully," said the confidential friend sympathetically.

"Oh, no," replied the philosopher serenely. "When I want to know what time it is, I just take out the pawn ticket and look at the nearest clock."—Chicago Record.

CAUTION.

Imitations have been put upon the market so closely resembling ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in general appearance as to be well calculated to deceive. MUSCLE AND VIGOR—A DIFFERENCE.

Many muscular men succumb to fatigues borne with ease by persons far their inferiors in physical strength. Muscle does not imply vigor. In fact, it is not difficult of proof that athletes do not live as long nor enjoy as good health as the average individual who is vigorous—that is to say, whose digestion and sleep are unimpaired, whose nerves are tranquil, and who has no organic tendency to disease. These requisites of vigor are conferred upon those inherently weak, no less than upon those debilitated through wasting disease, by a thorough, persistent course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the leading national tonic, indorsed and recommended by physicians of eminence. It will not endow you with a muscle of a Corbett, but it will infuse energy into your system, and renew the active and healthful performance of its functions. It averts and cures malarial, rheumatic and kidney complaints, and overcomes dyspepsia, constipation, liver trouble and nervousness.

The reader of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

TWO SCHOOLS OF MUSIC.

Mr. Uptowne Flatte Graphically Describes Them as He Finds Them.

"Talk about your different schools of music," said Mr. Uptowne Flatte the other day, "I'll tell you what's a fact, we have representatives in our flat of the two schools which are the most remote from each other at any rate. In the apartment under ours there is one of those democratic go-as-you-please um-dah players, and overhead there is a young woman who is the representative of the highest kind of a classical school."

"What kind of a musician did you say you had underneath?" asked the reporter.

"An um-dah player."

"A what?" asked the man again, more mystified than ever.

"Why, an um-dah player, of course. Didn't you ever hear one of those fiends who sits down at the piano and plays 'Um-dah, um-dah, um-dah-dah-dah, um-diddy-ah-dah, um-dah-dah-dah!' from morning until night and then from night until morning again?"

The reporter sadly acknowledged that he had had an experience of that sort.

"But I'll tell you what's a fact," Mr. Flatte rattled on, "the playing of the young woman up stairs would make an ice machine green with envy. For downright chilliness it beats anything which I have ever heard. A refrigerator must be an unnecessary article in that house. She ought to save money for the family some way, anyhow, because her musical education has cost a small fortune, I suppose. It is a genuine circus to see her play, though, and I suppose she takes enough physical exercise at the piano to obviate the necessity of horseback riding, or tennis playing, or anything of that sort. She has one of these long benches in front of the piano, and when she begins to play her favorite piece, opus something or other, she begins way down by the bass keys.

"Bangity, bang! bang!" she begins, and then there is a pause. After what seems to be an interminable time she takes a running slide up to the other end of the bench, and lifting her hand gracefully she touches one of the keys lightly.

"Bing!"

"Then she goes in her trance again, only to come out after awhile and repeat the same thing. I was scared when I first heard this, and I had begun to think that she had become suddenly galvanized, or hypnotized, or paralyzed, or something of that sort. I started to run for some water when my wife caught me by the coat tails and told me in a stage whisper to sit down. The player came back to the world again, and the way she pounded those keys was a caution. The man who makes the thunder on the stage wasn't in it with her. This part was short if it wasn't sweet, and then, seeing that there was going to be another of those painful pauses, I slipped around the corner. She awoke just as I returned. Away she went again from one end of the bench to the other and then back again. I'll give you a pointer on the fact that they were runs. No walking about them. Why, if she had been a boy her mother would have had a fit for fear he would have worn out his trousers.

"I suppose I'm ignorant," he said sadly as he finished his luncheon, "but there is no use of talking, I couldn't stand it, so I told the landlord that I should find a new flat next month."—New York Tribune.

Mr. Spurgeon's Method.

It was Spurgeon's custom to defer ostensible preparation until Saturday evening. Frequently when visiting him on that, his usual day for seeing friends, I have inquired what his subject was to be next morning, and he has replied that he knew no more than myself, and has asked me to suggest a text. I asked how he would set about it and he said in substance:

"After 6 o'clock family worship I bid my friends good night and take a turn in the garden or my study, revolving several texts. Presently one strikes me, and I write on a page of note paper a brief outline of thought. Then I read whatever my library can supply. The language comes when preaching. This for the morning. I do the same on Sunday afternoon for the evening. People say I am original. No; I use all the good things of others I can lay hold of. Some of my brethren spend two or three days writing their sermons. I have this advantage, that I can be reading and getting material all that time."

It would be absurd to infer that he was not original because he made use of the researches and suggestions of other minds. This is done by all speakers on all subjects. But he never slavishly borrowed or imitated. All that he read and observed, held in solution, crystallized around his own thought and shaped itself to him, not he to it. All he uttered had become Spurgeonic.—Good Words.

A Wonderful Piece of Furniture.

An inventor has contrived a new combination in furniture. When it stands upright in the drawing room it looks like an easel holding a portfolio that one might easily fancy filled with choice prints. But there is a curious little knob on the top which, being pressed, lets down the front of the portfolio. Instantly a pair of slender steel legs let themselves down from somewhere to support the front of the portfolio, which proves to be the shelf of the desk.

At back of that are numerous pigeonholes, boxes and all kinds of conveniences for holding things, together with inkstands, pencils, rulers, calendar and all the other equipments of a reliable desk. In the top of the easel frame also is set a tiny clock, like the watches set in ladies' bracelets, only larger. Another easel of the same design lets down into a dressing table, with much pale blue upholstery, and a large beveled mirror and many brushes, boxes and all kinds of appliances develop.—Cabinetmaker.

Ancient Objects as Amulets.

Ancient objects of various kinds are utilized as amulets, some charm being imagined to belong to them. Thus the little cylinders of stone which the Babylonians of old employed for seals are often seen dangling from watch chains. For the same purpose jewelers mount in gold or silver small fossil trilobites—crustaceans found in rocks that were formed perhaps 10,000,000 years ago, the ancestors of modern lobsters and crabs.—Washington Star.

PRETTY GIRLS.

Armies of Beauties May be Seen on New York's Streets Every Day.

WHERE TO VIEW THE LOVELINESS.

Every Type of Feminine Form and Feature is to be Found on the Metropolitan Sidewalk.

At no point in the city is there a prettier show to be seen than at the corner of Grand street and the Bowery at 6 o'clock every evening. At that hour the various factories along Howard, Grand, Greene and Wooster streets are being emptied of the thousands of nimble fingered young women who have been busy all day in the manufacture of garments of every description. Hundreds of salesgirls come tripping along, too, and the whole array of hearty looking toilers are beaming all over with the smiles that are woven on their faces as they tell each other of events which took place in their homes the previous night or in their shops during the day.

These Grand street girls are as much a part of the life and picturesqueness of Gotham as the wild whirlpool of humanity that surges toward the Brooklyn bridge about the same hour every evening.

There is an immense variety of expression and feature displayed by the throngs along Grand street. As the east side is peopled principally by the Hebrew and German elements, it naturally follows that these races should predominate in the beauty show. There is, however, a strong mixture of the Celtic race, and an occasional scattering of Hungarians, Italians and native Americans to be found in the moving throng. The intermarriages between these people for years and years back have resulted in creating types of female loveliness that lend a charm to the diverse beauty of Gotham's fair daughters.

One will find in the Grand street parades the large, lustrous dark eyes, the raven and wavy hair, the full, ripe lip and the suggestion of oriental complexion to be had in the Hebrew women. The flaxen hair and laughing blue eye of the Saxon maiden is there in its pristine beauty. The roguish, violet eyes, the wavy dark brown hair, the well developed and shapely figure and the fresh, clear and blooming complexion of Erin's fair daughters loom prominently in the bevy of beauties. Then there are the modifications of these styles of loveliness—the German-American girl, the Irish-American, the Hebrew-American, the German-Hebrew and the German-Irish. There is positively but very little limit to the styles and nationalities one can see on the Grand street parade.

Stand at Broadway and Fourteenth street at 6 o'clock. Note the difference in the girls that prance so cheerfully and happily along that street. They are an improvement as to dress, they are more "chic" and display more taste in general makeup than their sister working girls lower down town. But they are not one whit better looking. True, there are hosts of individual beauties among them, but there is less variety of type. On this corner one can readily pick out the better class of girls of foreign parentage, whose fathers and mothers have moved up town with the growth of the city.

It is at Broadway and Twenty-third street that the American working girl is seen in all her glory. She comes tripping along with that haughty spirit which characterizes the Yankee all over this broad land. She holds her head erect, her aggressively tilted nose is poised in air, her pouting lips are smilingly parted, and her heart destroying eyes play havoc with the youths who try to flirt with her as she passes. This same type of girl is in the daily rush at the bridge entrance. One can pick her out from among a million. She is overwhelming in her consciousness of superiority. She poses as a queen among women—and she is! Small wonder that the American girl of the day is the beauty which everybody with eyes to see concedes she is. She has in the concrete all the charms that individually characterize the women of every clime.

This is the result of the intermarriage of her ancestors. She has the small, highly arched foot of the southern European belle, the blended character and color of the eye of the Hebrew and German, the profusion of hair and perfection of complexion that is the glory of the Irish girl and a general grace of movement that is peculiar to American women. To crown all this there is a piquancy of manner and an indescribable air of roguish abandon that is evidently captured from the fair daughters of France. All these charms form the grand embodiment of personal beauty that dazzles one on Broadway and Fourteenth and Twenty-third streets every afternoon, and along Madison and Fifth avenues on the fine Sunday mornings.

Eighth avenue, from Fourteenth to Forty-second street, on Saturday evenings after dinner, is a good locality in which to find the pure Celtic type of beauty! Along the west side streets, in the neighborhood of the river, are thousands of Irish families who have but recently arrived from the old country. Their daughters are the ones who brighten up Eighth avenue on Saturday nights. They laugh with generous carelessness; they joke aloud; they retort with stinging suddenness and witty penetration to any remarks made by men who try to enter into conversation with them as they march along looking at the bargains in the windows.

Avenue A on Saturday nights is another splendid field on which to view a different type. Here will be found the generously proportioned Gretchen elbowing her way along among hosts of flaxen haired Marguerites. The ruddy faced grocery clerks pause every now and then to murmur, "Ach, mein leiber machen!"

The pure Hebraic type is found along Canal street and East Broadway every afternoon. It is there that the great lustrous eyes of the daughters of the chosen people are to be met with more plentifully than in any other city in the world. They are numerous in Ludlow, Essex, Norfolk and Suffolk streets and along Allen and Eldridge streets.

Away up in Harlem, along that splendid thoroughfare of which the up town people are so justly proud, the mixed races are found in great luxuriance. It is on One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street on Saturday evening—in fact every evening, for that matter—that the daughter of the Irish mother and the American father, or the Irish father and American mother, is to be met with in all the glory of her sex. Here, too, is the German-American lassie up to date. These girls have a beauty all their own. It is combined with a hilariousness of manner and a prodigality of laughter and smiles that, in cases where pure beauty does not exist, more than atone for its absence.—New York Recorder.

THRILLING AND MIRACULOUS.

A Woman's Narrow Escape from a Terrible Death on a Trestlework.

Mrs. Louise Alger, Mrs. Susie Sloane and the latter's ten-year-old boy had a thrilling experience about noon on Tuesday.

They attempted to cross the trestlework of what is known as the Alice street bridge on the Alameda broad gauge railroad, and when they had traversed half the distance they were overtaken by a train and narrowly escaped death.

The women live at 365 Fourth street, Oakland, and had been on the south side of the estuary to gather green stuffs. They were accompanied by a large Newfoundland dog, and were carrying with them a sack containing the vegetables they had gathered. Soon after the train had rounded the curve and rushed on to the bridge the engineer evidently saw them, for he blew his whistle and at once applied the air brakes.

The women, realizing their peril, at once seized the wooden girders at the side of the track and swung themselves outward to avoid being struck by the train. Between the rails and the side of the bridge there is a space of perhaps two and a half feet, and the track, being a single one, there was no other hope of escape for them than by the means they adopted.

Mrs. Sloane grasped her boy frantically and held him with her right hand while her left arm encircled the upright. As the engine came steaming toward them the dog, which is owned by Mrs. Alger, jumped into the middle of the track and faced it, barking incessantly as he did so. Seeing the peril in which the animal was placed his owner leaned forward and grasped him just as the engine was about to dash him to death upon the ties. Mrs. Alger is a powerful woman, and with a sudden jerk she pulled the faithful dog from the track and sent him flying down into the water beneath.

But this effort almost cost her life. Before she could recover herself the engine struck her and literally tore her clothing to shreds. The long cloth coat she wore was torn from her back, her dress was ripped in a hundred places, as though it had been drawn through a thrashing machine, and her left boot was torn from her foot. The engine struck her on the left hip and arm, and how it happened that she was not hurled from the bridge by the force of the shock is little less than a miracle.

The train was brought to a standstill at about half its length beyond the scene of the accident, and the trainmen and a number of the passengers went back to render assistance. The injured woman was conveyed to the Oakland Receiving hospital by Conductor Alexander Buchanan, and the train was taken on to the mole by George Teeple, the regular conductor of the train.

At the hospital it was discovered that no bones were broken, but the unfortunate woman had received severe bruises and contusions on the left side of her body. She was overjoyed when told that a boatman had rescued her dog.

"I don't care about myself," she said, as she hobbled out of the hospital, "but if that dog of mine had been killed I'd never have held my head up again. I have had him a good many years and he has saved my life two or three times. I used to live out on the Mohave desert and did cooking for the railroad company. It was then that the dog did good service for me."—San Francisco Examiner.

Where Victory Perched.

A fashionably dressed lady was walking up the north side of Chestnut street toward Tenth. Behind her placidly trotted a small bulldog with a black eye. As the pair reached Tenth street a big tawny St. Bernard dog was coming down toward Chestnut street following a colored man. The dogs spotted each other immediately. The bulldog stood still and the hair could be seen to slowly rise up on his back, while the St. Bernard trotted forward. The owner of the bulldog had crossed Tenth street without missing her pet. She turned to look for him just as the St. Bernard trotted up. "Oh, oh!" she screamed, "that big, horrid dog will hurt my poor little pet. Somebody do please take him away."

The feelings of the bulldog were evidently hurt by this remark, for he unceremoniously made a spring upon the big St. Bernard's throat which was encircled by a large leather collar. The bulldog fixed his fangs in the leather and held to it like death. It is hard to tell which made the most noise, the dogs or the lady owner of the bulldog. She thought surely that her pet would be killed. In the end the collar of the St. Bernard had to be taken off and the bulldog went trotting off with it in his mouth after his mistress had paid well for it.—Philadelphia Record.

Amulets on Watch Guards.

It is upon watch guards nowadays that amulets are mostly worn. They are supposed to possess all sorts of virtues supernatural. It is astonishing how many people, even in this enlightened Nineteenth century, have faith in them. Although belief in ghosts and witches no longer prevails, yet dread of the mysterious unknown in nature retains more or less influence over every human mind. Individuals are often heard to say that they "have no superstitions," but in reality there is no one who does not cherish a few secretly.

The form in which this weakness is most commonly exhibited is an unreasoning faith that luck inheres in certain objects. You pick up a copper cent in the street and put it in your pocketbook for a "luck penny." It is an amulet pure and simple.—Washington Star.

"Vell, couldn't you turned your head to one side veh you spit?"

Beecher and Spurgeon.

Beecher had said that Spurgeon owed his popularity no more to his Calvinism than a camel owed its excellence to its hump. "I replied," said Spurgeon, "that the hump was a store of fat on which the camel lived on a long journey, and that its value depended on its hump."—Good Words.

A POPULAR SPORT

History of Yachting During the Last Three Hundred Years.

THE FIRST INTERNATIONAL RACE.

Changes in the Construction of Vessels.—Charles II Among the First Patrons of the Sport.

The term "yacht" is derived from the Danish word "jaght," meaning a chase; hence yachting is the chasing of one vessel after another, and accordingly yachting and yacht racing are synonymous expressions.

A yacht is and always has been essentially a pleasure craft, but in the early days no yacht of any size existed. Thus we find a writer in 1706 referring to a yacht as "a small ship built for swiftness and pleasure rather than for merchandise or warlike service." History does not tell us where, when or under what circumstances yachts were first built, but it is certain they are of ancient origin and were only owned by royal persons and great nobles. The latter fact receives corroboration from an ancient but carefully compiled dictionary of singular words, where a yacht is described as "a pleasure craft of not more than 100 tons for the king's use."

The earliest mention of a yacht in this country was as far back as the Anglo-Saxon period, when King Athelstan received from the king of Norway a present of a magnificent state barge, rigged with purple sails and decorated with wrought gold. Queen Elizabeth, we know, frequently used a state barge, and so have successive sovereigns to this day. It is curious to relate, and goes far to show the primitive nature of our early resources, that while foreigners were able to build yachts their example was not followed in this country till 1588, when the first English yacht was constructed at Cowes and launched from that port.

But while 1588 may be fixed as the commencement of yacht building in England, it cannot be said that during the next half century much progress was made with the newly acquired industry. Indeed, had it not been for Charles II, it is probable that the trade would not have been established for some time to come. King Charles, however, was very fond of sailing, and the Dutch East India company, with the view of gaining royal favor, presented him with a small sloop rigged vessel. The advent of the foreign built vessel evidently stimulated native talent, as we find Evelyn, in his diary of Oct. 1, 1661, writing, "I sailed this morning with his majesty in one of his yachts or pleasure boats, vessels not known among us till the Dutch East India company presented that curious piece to the king." But the king was not only a yachtsman; he was also a designer, and drew the lines of the Jamie, a 25 tonner, built at Lambeth, and raced her against the Bezan, a small Dutch built vessel belonging to the Duke of York.

The course was from Greenwich to Gravesend and back and the prize £100, which was won by the Bezan. As the ships were designed and constructed in different countries the race may fairly claim to have possessed an international character, while from the fact that the royal owners steered their own boats it was clearly an amateur match. Unfortunately with the death of Charles II came another lull in the history of yachting, and it was not till early in the eighteenth century that any real revival took place. During this long interval, however, yachting had gradually become a more democratic amusement, and the sport of kings had descended to the level of commoners. Cork harbor became a favorite yachting ground and during the summer months was crowded with diminutive pleasure vessels. Indeed, so popular did the sport become that in 1720 the Cork Harbor Water club was formed to encourage yacht racing. The club ultimately developed into what is now the Royal Cork Yacht club. Here, then, we have the first authentic attempt at organization in the yachting world.

A few years later the sport came into favor in the south of England, and Maitland, in his "History of London" (1739), refers to sailing as one of the amusements to be met with on the river Thames, while later still (1801) Strutt, in his well known work on "Sports and Pastimes," mentions the existence of a society consisting of certain gentlemen who gave a silver cup to be sailed for annually in the vicinity of London. Toward the close of the eighteenth century Cowes became the favorite resort of yacht racing, but still the contending vessels were of small size, none being over 35 tons. It was not until the foundation of the yacht club, afterward the Royal Yacht club and now the world renowned Royal Yacht squadron, that yachting in this country may fairly be said to have established itself as a national sport, and even then (1812) the number of yachts afloat only reached 50, all told. But from this time the popularity of yachting rapidly grew, and club after club followed in quick succession.—London Times.

Paid the Farmer For His Trouble.

A farmer in China, Me., recently heard smothered squawking in his henhouse, and 'twas midnight. When he went out, he found the henhouse door ajar, and sounds indicated that the intruder was still within. Therefore the farmer slammed the door, bolted it and posted himself outside the henhouse until morning did appear. Then he looked in the window and discerned a neighbor, who came contritely forth and paid the farmer $28 for time, loss of sleep, etc. Still people say there is no money in farming.—Lewiston Journal.

Just the Time.

Jack—How would it do for me to speak to your father tonight?

Jess—Best time in the world. He got the bill for my new bonnet just before we started for our drive.—Exchange.

His Method.

The broad sombrero and the long hair of the stranger indicated that he was from the wilds of the wildest west. He was telling the boys in a Clark street resort about some of his experiences in the late Sioux war. After a half hour of reminiscences a meek and lowly lounger who had been quiet arose from a table in the corner of the room and interrupted the exercises by remarking quietly, "My friend, I have been keeping tab on your stories for the last few minutes and I find that you have accredited yourself with the deaths of 2,760 bucks, to say nothing of squaws and papooses, within two months."

The silence for a moment was oppressive. Then the stranger slowly said: "Is that all? By jingo, I must have left out a week's work somewhere."

The ready calculator finally ventured to ask a question: "If you have been so successful in exterminating the red men, why wouldn't it be a good plan for General Miles to keep his regulars at home and let you do all the fighting for the United States government?"

"It would be a great financial saving, beyond doubt," replied the visitor, "but the fact is my health would not permit me to continue in the business. My eyes had been so strained by continually sighting along my gun barrel that during the last two weeks I was totally blind."

"And you actually continued to slaughter Indians in such a condition?" queried a bystander.

"Certainly."

"But how could you shoot under such circumstances?"

"Who said anything about shooting? Of course I couldn't shoot when I was blind. I used to listen, and whenever I could hear an Indian I would run him down, trample him into the mud and stamp him to death."

At this point the meeting adjourned sine die.—Chicago Mail.

Wanton Waste of Coal.

There are just a certain number of tons of coal lying in the earth, and when these are gone there can be no more forthcoming. There is no manufacture of coal in progress at the present time. The useful mineral was the product of a very singular period in the earth's history, the like of which has not again occurred in any noteworthy degree in the geological ages which have since run their course. Our steam engines are methods of spending this hoard, and what we often hear lauded as some triumph in human progress is merely the development of some fresh departure in a frightful extravagance.

We would justly regard a man as guilty of expending his substance wastefully if he could not perform a journey without a coach and six and half a dozen outriders, and yet we insist that the great steamers which take us across the Atlantic shall be run at a speed which requires engines, let us say, of 12,000 horse power. If the number of passengers on such a vessel be set down as 500, we have for each passenger the united force of twenty-four horses, day and night, throughout the voyage.

I expect our descendants will think that our coal cellars have been emptied in a very wasteful manner, particularly when they reflect that if we had been content with a speed somewhat less than that at present demanded, the necessary consumption of coal would have been reduced in a far greater proportion than the mere alteration of speed would imply.—Sir Robert Ball in Fortnightly Review.

Her Whole Life.

"The forewoman in our sewing room," said a manufacturer of men's neckwear recently, "is likely to be at the head of an establishment of her own some day. She came to us as an apprentice and is an excellent illustration of what a woman or man either may accomplish who gives her mind entirely to her work. She did not even sew very well at first, but improved from the first day. She advanced rapidly and became an expert in the sewing room, doing the finest work. Then she began to have ideas about scarfs and ties which we were only too glad to develop. She is forewoman now, but we often send her out to select stuffs, and her choice is always artistic and original. When I complimented her the other day on a specially important suggestion, I said to her:

"'How do you think of all these things?'

"'Why,' she replied, 'I eat, drink and sleep neckties. They are never out of my mind a moment. If I see a woman with a pretty dress I wonder how the combination can be applied to a tie. I never pass a man without studying and criticising his tie. My mother says I find a suggestion in the very food on the table, and I don't know but she is right.' That's the spirit of success in neckties as in everything else, and I believe the young woman will come into the firm yet or start out for herself."—Her Point of View in New York Times.

"Bubbles."

At the opening of the new wing of the Glenalmond school, in Scotland, by Mr. Gladstone, one of the choir of boys called forth great admiration from the ladies present. The boy, with his aureole of fair hair and blue eyes lighting up the sweetest of child faces, realized the popular conception of a cherub. Still greater interest was evinced in him when he was discovered to be the grandson of Sir John Millais, the original of the famous "Bubbles" boy, familiar to us all by his portrait in the soap advertisements. The burden of his greatness lies somewhat heavily on the little fellow, as he is called "Bubbles" by all who know him, or know of him. By that name he will probably go down to posterity, just as Master Buttall, painted by Gainsborough, will always be known as "the Blue Boy," from his handsome costume, being all of the shade known as royal blue, and the melancholy Master Lampton, by Sir Thomas Lawrence, will always be "the Boy in Red."—Art Amateur.

An Original Disguise.

Talking of the carnival season, we may draw the attention of our readers to an easy and very amusing mode of disguise, invented by a celebrated French painter. You put on your coat the wrong way and button it, not in front, but down the back, the collar front and white tie to be arranged in the same way, to face backward, and, if you like, the pants in like manner. Then you affix a mask to the back of your head and step into the ballroom, walking backward. We guarantee that your appearance will create no end of fun, especially when, on suddenly turning around, you exhibit your true face to the company.—Secolo.

A QUEER HOBBY.

The Effeminate Notions of an Old Soldier Citizen of Maine.

VISIONS OF LACE AND RUFFLES.

He Wears Petticoats and Has a More Costly Feminine Wardrobe Than any Woman in Town.

Commander James Robbins of the local post G. A. R., Cooper's Mills, Lincoln county, in this state, is one of the prominent men of his community, a citizen generally esteemed as a man of integrity and intelligence. Mr. Robbins has a brilliant war record as a member of the Thirtieth Maine. He has lived in the village since 1883 and is a jeweler. His house is a neat cottage house on the brow of the hill as one drives into the Mills. In the narrow front hallway is Mr. Robbins' bench, lathe and tools, and here you will find him placidly working away at the tiny wheels and springs.

If you are on sufficiently intimate terms with Mr. Robbins you will find him indulging in his hobby. He has one, like the most of us. In his case the hobby is startlingly picturesque, and it may be safely said that he is the most original man in the state of Maine, so far as his curious fancy is concerned. He wears petticoats. Not when he goes down street for the mail and to do his marketing. At these times he slips on the masculine pantaloons. Yet he does not wear his trousers, even, like ordinary masculinity. No suspenders for him. He wears a sort of dress waist, and his trousers are buttoned tightly about his hips. He always wears a woman's number six shoe, with high heels and graceful, slender shape. Mr. Robbins weighs something like 180 pounds, and the effect produced by those shoes peeping coyly out from beneath manly trouser legs is startling, to say the least. Mr. Robbins doesn't mince or toddle, and his shoes seem to fit him pretty well.

He reserves his petticoats for the sanctity of the home circle, for the partial retirement of his orchard and for calls upon neighbors with whom his acquaintance is close. Mr. Robbins isn't squeamish about showing himself in petticoats. He enjoys wearing them, he has worn them when opportunity has presented all his life long, and he wears them scientifically too. In the first place, there's no half way business about it. Every detail of feminine attire is there, and Mr. Robbins is rightly fussy about the details.

There is no woman in Cooper's Mills who owns so many dresses of such excellent material as does the commander of the Cooper's Mills post. He takes pride in having only the best. His lingerie is elaborately tucked and ruffled, edged with lace and fashioned according to the most approved models of any lady's wardrobe. The material is of the finest quality, and when Mr. Robbins lifts his skirts the eye gets a vision of ruffles, lace and "all such like" of dazzing whiteness and immaculate smoothness.

He is very particular about his ironing. Everything must be starched "up to the handle," whatever that is, and sometimes Mrs. Robbins finds her hands full and her clotheshorse loaded down like a pack donkey. Amazed neighbors, who were not fully aware of the extent of Mr. Robbins' hobby, have been obliged to ask for more details, when Mrs. Robbins has laconically informed them that "it is Jim's ironing." Mr. Robbins' hosiery is of the long sort, and it is currently rumored that the stockings are hitched up at the sides. His corsets he has made especially for his girth, and these he wears continually. His shape is fairly good, especially when he dresses up for afternoons.

In the morning he wears print gowns, for he assists in the housework. Almost every morning Mr. Robbins in his print gown is seen sweeping off the piazza and whisking about the kitchen. He wears petticoats at home almost exclusively, putting on his garb as soon as he enters the house. For afternoon wear his gowns are elaborate. Some of them are made by Mr. Robbins, and some are fashioned by local dressmakers. One cashmere dress is quite a favorite, and this is frequently worn by Mr. Robbins when he promenades in the orchard. He has lots of these good clothes, all of fashionable cut, puffed sleeves, and with all the fixings that go to lend grace and dignity. Usually he wears an apron and especially so when at his bench. The apron is white ordinarily and has a bib with ruffled straps and pockets. Therefore does Mr. Robbins present a somewhat unique appearance as he works away of afternoons or sits and converses with his wife.

Look at the gown and you see a stylishly attired woman, but the face is very mannish indeed. Mr. Robbins would be marked in any crowd. His face is full, and he wears a jet black mustache that possibly owes its color to art. His hair is long, black and curly, his voice is deep and full, and there's nothing effeminate about him except his attire.—Lewiston Journal.

First Glass Windows.

The first glass window in England was one put in the Teltrom abbey in the year 680 A. D. Glass windows did not come into general use for many hundred years after that date. As late as 1577 the glass casements of Amsworth castle were regularly taken down and packed away whenever the owner and his family went visiting.—St. Louis Republic.

INHABITED BY CATS.

An Island Off the California Coast Is Overrun with Pussies.

Santa Barbara island, off the coast of Ventura county, is a rocky peak which rises many feet above the sea, without verdure and watered only by such lakelets as gather in recesses of the cliffs during rainstorms. It is uninhabitable and undesirable in every way, since it affords no shelter to vessels nor anything that might be of value to their crews. Fishermen touch in passing, but they are the only men who ever bring news from the bleak sentinel rock. The island is about three-eighths of a square mile in area and stands a frowning menace to navigators. Its position, seventy-five miles from the coast line, would make it suitable as a summering place if any attractions were there, but its only inhabitants are cats. Where the cats came from or why they have thrived upon the desolate rock are unanswerable queries. They are there in numbers and increasing.

No one believes that evolution has produced them from starfish or that they were generated spontaneously. The only tenable theory, and that one which finds general acceptance, is that the tom and tabby cats from some fishing smack which touched at Santa Barbara island must have gone ashore and been left when the smack sailed away. Common sailors and fishermen the world over have, in fancy, peopled unknown shores with all sorts of strange monsters and distorted men, and Santa Barbara island, in common with other rarely visited spots, has been wreathed about with garlands of seadog fancy until the superstitious have come to look upon it as an uncanny place. Sailors tell of horrible phantoms that sail through the air from pinnacle to pinnacle of the rocks, singing as they fly, and of others that gather near the water's edge and entice the mariner by lascivious genuflexions and soft murmurings like those of the sirens who wait everywhere for Jack ashore. But it is all cats.

The cats do the singing, and if there is any murmuring the cats purr that into the eagerly receptive sailor ears. Fish are in plenty about the island, but some of the fishermen have fancied that certain whitish objects near the beach on the southern side are human skulls, and other objects are thought to be the bones of human castaways who may perchance have, after death, been gnawed by the cats.

When all the foolishness of the fishermen is put aside there yet remains the curious fact that the island is thickly infested by cats of all colors. They manage to live by eating such fish as may be washed upon the beaches or among the rocks and find the young and eggs of sea birds at certain seasons. An occasional feast of flesh is carried to them in the carcass of a porpoise killed from some passing vessel, or in the carrion refuse from adjacent whaling stations drifted to the island by tidal currents. A precarious existence it is at best, and the wonder is small that the cats are gaunt and eager. They troop about their island, and sometimes indulge in general engagements, after which the survivors devour the killed and wounded.

Six years ago two fishermen of Ventura were lost at sea. A year later another fisherman, Fazzio by name, was carried by adverse winds near Santa Barbara island, and when he at last escaped being wrecked and returned to his home he told a ghastly tale of snowy skulls on the island beach and wreckage from a fishing sloop among the rocks. He fancied the skulls must be those of his missing friends. He told of angry, screeching cats that gathered on the rocks and apparently waited for his body to be cast ashore, and his story soon became a legend of the island.

Shooting parties have gone to the island and wasted ammunition in practice upon the yowling beasts, but without diminishing the number materially.

The lonely island is still in possession of the pussies, and passing sailors piously cross themselves as they hear awful voices coming up, out of the depths apparently.—San Francisco Examiner.

Three Signs.

When I was a young man I was employed in an Ohio town of some 1,800 inhabitants. One day the town was billed from roof to foundation in flaming letters, "They're coming!" One couldn't go amiss of the big letters. They followed him everywhere, and half the town would awaken in the middle of the night with those huge letters staring them in the face, while they wondered what it all meant.

A week or more passed, and one morning every one of those signs was covered with another equally flaming "They Have Come, at Town Hall Tonight!" and you may be sure the town turned out in force. There wasn't standing room, although a liberal admittance fee was charged. Inside a big curtain excluded the stage, and to this all eyes were turned as the appointed hour drew near. There was a little delay, and it was about half past 8 when the curtain slowly arose, dislosing to view another of the big lettered signs, only the wording was different this time.

The sign read, "They Have Gone!" and you can bet your last dollar it wasn't long before the townspeople had gone. Some clever fellows had worked the game successfully and got away with a snug little sum, leaving only a couple of townspeople to pull up the curtain.—Interview in Hartford Courant.

The English Leads Them All.

The English far exceeds any other modern language in the number of words it contains. The words in the English language have during the latter half of the present century increased with great rapidity, and the latest dictionaries, such as the Oxford, contain no less than 250,000 words. The four modern languages having the next largest number of words are the German with 80,000 words, the Italian with 45,000, the French with 30,000, and the Spanish with 20,000 words. Of eastern tongues Arabic is far the richest in its vocabulary. Chinese has 10,362 characters, which are combined into 49,030 compound words; Tamil, spoken in southern India, 67,452; Turkish, 22,530; that of Hawaii, one of the South Sea islands, 15,500; the Zulu-Kaffirs, Colenso found, had 8,000 words, and the natives of New South Wales possessed only 2,200.—London Tit-Bits.

Thwarting a Hoodoo.

All actors are secretly unhappy if they meet a cross eyed man or woman on the way to the theater, and the only method of throwing off the "hoodoo" is to cross the two forefingers and make the motion of "spitting" over them. This is a very dreadful thing to see accomplished by a fair soubrette, or "ingenue," but she will usually be guilty of pursing up her pretty mouth and simulating the offensive act in case the necessity arise.—Chicago Post.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30 1894

Gen. Francis A. Walker, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and one of the first political economists of the country, delivered an address in New Haven recently by invitation of President Dwight and a large number of professors of Yale university, to an audience of 3,000 people, in which he gave utterance to some very plain truths—truths which it behooves eastern audiences to take very seriously to heart. Among other things he said: "The repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman Act settled nothing. It only opened the way for a proper solution of the monetary problem. The attempt to to hush up this discussion was futile. It came from those who, more than all others, were responsible for the unfortunate situation existing, namely, the gold monometallists, who, after forcing on the demonetization of silver, had not ceased to deride, insult and misrepresent those who stood by the traditional American policy, which had come down from Washington and Hamilton, of basing the circulation upon both the precious metals."

As to the practicability of bimetalism General Walker dwelt at length upon the experience of France and showed that that country single-handed maintained substantial parity between gold and silver at a ratio of 1 to 15½ from 1803 to 1873, and that notwithstanding the tremendous fluctuations in production and use of the two metals the bimetallic system, supported by one country only during most of that period, prevented any extensive change of values, the total prodigious discoveries of California and Australia simultaneously being to alter the gold price of silver considerably less than 2 per cent. Whereas within the last twenty years, or since the practical abandonment of bimetalism by Europe and the United States the gold price of silver has fluctuated between $1.33 and 60 cents, or less, per fine ounce; or, the silver price of a pennyweight of gold has varied in the world's market from less than $1 to $2.20! In view of the fact that the wealth and the labor of mankind are gauged or measured by these two great money metals—each of which is a standard for vast groups of the human race—such fluctuations in their values is simply apalling, not to say revolutionary. For certainly a fall in the price of staple commodities of one-half inside of twenty years is revolutionary in every sense of the word.—Herald.

And now comes along the pestiferous Cruelty to Animals society of San Francisco and stands in the way of a most interesting and instructive trial of strength and ferocity between two animals that are no account on earth. The first is the murderous lion, Parnell, who has killed a number of his keepers, his last murderous escapade dating only a few weeks back, when he killed poor Thieman. The second is a big grizzly bear, equally noted for his ferocity. It was proposed to get up a fight between these beasts in the arena where the shows take place daily, and one would think that it would be at least a question of "fight husband, fight bear." But along comes the pesky society aforesaid and puts a veto on what could not have failed to be one of the prettiest shindies in the world while it lasted.

The death of Louis Kossuth removes from off the sphere of life one of the purest patriots and greatest humanitarians of the age. Kossuth's plan for the independence of his native Hungary failed because of the peculiar position of that kingdom between two powerful nations like Austria and Russia, which enabled them to march troops into the country with ease. Had Hungary been geographically situated so that nature would have assisted the Hungarian patriots, Kossuth would have been a Washington. As it was, he dies beloved and respected by all friends of liberty.

Sensations are the order of the day. The thug who shot cashier Herrick in San Francisco turns out to be Fredericks, the man who killed Sheriff Pascoe and who was a confederate of Chris Evans. Take it all in all, these piping times of peace are not without sensations.

The news from the East is very sad. A respite has been granted to Prendergast and Waite is still at large.

Bar silver, 59½.

H. P. Cartier started for San Francisco last Saturday.

Pear and apple trees are following the apricots into blossom.

R. P. Hession of Big Pine spent a few days in town this week.

The close season on trout closes on Sunday. L. Wood has a fine supply of fishing tackle.

Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Smith were down from Big Pine last Saturday on land business.

Charley Collins received two car-loads of hay from Big Pine last Monday for use at his ditch camp.

Clark Young passed through town early in the week on his way home to Bishop from Los Angeles.

The Independence school will not close until April 20th, a week later than stated in our last issue.

G. W. Brady is getting the Courthouse grounds in good shape and keeps the premises neat and clean.

G. Sanger expects to return to Bakersfield to reside, having leased his ranch at Alvord to F. W. Holbert.

A. W. Eibeshutz has been appointed Receiver of the Land Office at Independence, vice Bertrand Raine, resigned.

Robert O'Neal arrived at Bishop last Monday from San Francisco. He visited Independence during the week.

The Board of Supervisors meets in regular session on Monday. Several contracts will be let by the Board next week.

The weather, though quite warm has been cloudy for the past week and that long expected rain storm cannot be far away.

James Herod came down from Big Pine last Tuesday with a number of teams and will go to work immediately on the big canal.

Arthur Robinson, son of E. Robinson of Independence, has been very ill for the past two weeks. He is to-day reported to be some better.

Wm. McDonald and J. Shoemaker were down from Big Pine early in the week. Mr. McDonald had charge of removing the remains of J. W. Smith.

Bert. Rhine expects to start for Los Angeles next week. From there he will go to San Francisco and visit at the Mid-winter Fair a couple of weeks.

A meeting of the Board of Directors of Agricultural District No. 18 will be held at Independence next Monday to make arrangements for the coming fair.

Wm. Borgwardt went south yesterday on his way to Bakersfield with eighty head of horses recently purchased from G. Sanger of Alvord. Ed. Smith is with him.

Miss Etta Naylor will arrive from San Francisco on to-day's train. She has been enjoying a well merited vacation at the Mid-winter Fair and other places of interest.

Mairs & Holbert started their beef cattle for Los Angeles yesterday from the Sanger ranch. They will drive out about four hundred head. Over $20,000 worth of Owens Valley beef will be marketed at Los Angeles this year, which will be quite an addition income of the county.

Dr. S. G. George and his nephew, Morton George, passed through town to-day on their way from Porterville to Bishop. Dr. George is one of the very early pioneers of Inyo county, having made the first mining location here 35 years ago. Morton says that his brother, Fred George, is at Fresno where he has a good position.

The Bland Seignirage Bill.

The Bland bill for coining the silver seignirage and other bullion, which now awaits President Cleveland's signature, provides as follows:

SEC. 1. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be coined as fast as possible the silver bullion held in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issuing of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," to the amount of the gain or seignorage of such bullion, to wit: The sum of $55,156,681, and such coin or the silver certificates issued thereon shall be used in the payment of public expenditures, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, if the needs of the Treasury demand it, issue silver certificates in excess of such coinage; provided, that said excess shall not exceed the amount of the seignorage as herein authorized to be coined.

SEC. 2. After the coinage provided for in the first section of this act, the remainder of the silver bullion purchased of said act of July 14, 1890, shall be coined into legal tender standard silver dollars as fast as possible, and the coin shall be held in the Treasury for the redemption of the Treasury notes issued in the purchase of said bullion; that as fast as the bullion shall be coined for the redemption of said notes the notes shall not be reissued, but shall be cancelled and destroyed in amounts equal to the coin held at any time in the Treasury derived from the coinage herein provided for, and silver certificates shall be issued on such in the manner now provided by law; provided, that this act shall not be construed to change existing laws relating to the legal tender character or mode of redemption of the Treasury notes issued under said act of July 14, 1890. That a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

To The Public.

Inyo's representative at the Midwinter Fair, Mr. G. P. Rixford, has informed the Executive Committee that the space is now ready for the reception of exhibits. Parties having anything to exhibit will kindly leave the same with the representative in their vicinity for shipment. Bring on all you have. Small exhibits from all will make up a large general display. The following are authorized to receive exhibits: John Bourland, Bishop; R. W. Thomas, Big Pine; A. W. Eibeshutz, Independence; E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine.

Remains Removed.

On Sunday last the remains of J. W. Smith were reinterred in the Masonic cemetery at Independence. Mr. Smith died at Bishop on January 21, 1887, and was buried there by Inyo Lodge No. 221, F. & A. M., of which he was a member. The same lodge caused his remains to be removed to their cemetery at Independence. In 1880 he was elected Sheriff of Inyo county, succeeding J. J. Moore, and was in turn succeeded by S. G. Gregg in 1882. He was a deservedly popular man whose old time friends hold his memory in high esteem.

CAUTION.

My wife, Maud B. Day, having left my bed and board without any cause whatever, and against my consent, I will not be responsible for any debts she may contract from and after this date.

There has been an imputation made by parties who do not know the facts of the case that Tom Taylor "threw" his friends in his race with Ed. Ober from the fact that he beat Walter Ober in 10 seconds and was beaten seven feet by Ed. Ober in the same time. In the last race the men ran thirteen feet farther than in the first, so that Taylor actually ran six feet faster in the last race than the first.

W. E. Hill, foreman of the Holmes Company mill, shot himself through the brain at Candelaria last Sunday afternoon with a 22-calibre rifle, causing instant death. It is believed that his mind was deranged. Billy Hill was well known on the Comstock having been a resident of Gold Hill for a number of years. He was at one time a member of the Nevada legislature.

Now that the breeding season is at hand horse owners should not neglect the opportunity to secure the services of Albanton, 4023. This horse has proved his worth as a sire, his colts being speedy and of good size and style. It costs no more to raise a good horse than a scrub and there is more satisfaction in it.

WAR IS IMMINENT.

The Growing European Crisis Greatly Aggravated by Italy's Condition.

It is the Italian situation which most directly threatens in this growing European crisis. France has shown surprising and most creditable restraint during the past two weeks. Her ambitious purpose has not been misjudged by those who have seen the sinister designs behind her protestations of peace, but she is wise enough to know that the hour for the execution of her plans has not quite come. But if Italy assumes an aggressive part she will play into French hands. France is ready, and with her new ally at her back will rejoice if one of her adversaries will assume the responsibility of making the attack.

The situation in Italy does not improve. It has become intolerable, and some violent result of the crisis seems inevitable. There is some truth in the statement that the trouble is caused more by moral than material decadence. Patriotism has waned. The country is bankrupt—not because it cannot pay its taxes, but because it will not pay. The reply of the Marquis di Rudinì to Premier Giolitti is justified when he says it is useless to impose additional taxes, because they will yield no more than the old ones. The people best able to pay will, the marquis asserts, evade payment with more ingenuity and perseverance.

Giolitti's government recognizes the truth of this observation, and it is this fact which gives color to the reports that the present ministry has been considering a war with France as a desperate remedy for the solution of its dilemma. The people would willingly supply the sinews of war, but they refuse longer to be victims of the thieves in high places, whose guilt is notorious, but who are protected by all the resources of the government and crown. If winter were just ending instead of approaching, it would be a question of days only, in the opinion of many people, when Italy would fire the first gun in the greatest of European wars.

Meantime the crisis is a most embarrassing one for the present rulers of the peninsula. It is difficult to see how the winter can be passed without a crash of some sort. Already the popular discontent is at the point of revolution in some parts of the kingdom. The government continues to pour troops into Sicily, and its newspaper organs virtually admit that the aim is the suppression of sedition rather than the extirpation of brigandage, although the latter laudable work is proceeding incidentally. It has been ascertained that the Fasci or associations of revolutionary socialists have a membership of 300,000, embracing all classes in Sicily. Even some regiments are tainted, and severe disciplinary measures have had to be taken against a regiment of artillery at present in the garrison at Palermo. The Sun correspondent says that serious disturbances may occur at any moment.—New York Sun's London Letter.

THE GRASS.

The grass so little has to do—
A sphere of simple green,
With only butterflies to brood,
And bees to entertain,

And stir all day to pretty tunes
The breezes fetch along,
And hold the sunshine in its lap,
And bow to everything;

And thread the dews all night, like pearls,
And make itself so fine—
A duchess were too common
For such a noticing.

And even when it dies, to pass
In odors so divine,
As lowly spices gone to sleep,
Or amulets of pine.

And then to dwell in sov'reign barns,
And dream the days away—
The grass so little has to do,
I wish I were the hay!

CAPTURING A THIEF.

Twenty-five years ago certain parts of western Wisconsin were infested with horse thieves. Their operations were so systematic and covered so large a region that detection was extremely difficult.

For a few years indeed they had things much their own way, but at last the farmers, goaded to action by the failure of the authorities to cope with the thieves, organized themselves into vigilance committees.

The committees were not lawless bodies of lynchers, but were societies incorporated under the laws of the state to protect their members against larceny and to recover stolen property.

The active work of these vigilance committees was done by "the riders," usually five in number, one of whom was captain. When more help was needed, the riders might call to their assistance as many members as the case seemed to demand.

Among the scores of hardened men who at that time alternately worked and loafed along the Mississippi river was one named Jim Corsen. Though nothing criminal had been proved against him, his practices and associations gave color to the suspicion that he would not hesitate to steal whatever property he could safely make off with. In his habits he was reckless, dissolute and defiant.

In one particular he differed from most of his lawless associates. Instead of constantly loafing about the river, whether there was work to be had or not, he would occasionally go back a few miles into the country, hire out to some farmer and work for a week or two.

One of the men for whom he had worked several times was William Dexter, a good natured, easy going old farmer who lived ten miles from the river. Corsen had worked so well for Dexter that the old farmer had begun to feel confidence in him.

"Corsen ain't so big a rascal as some folks would like to make out," he said to one of his neighbors, who had suggested that it was not wise to have such a fellow about.

Like most of his neighbors at that time, Dexter allowed his cattle to roam at will during the day, and at night shut them in a yard near the house.

On going out to milk his cows one morning, he found the bars down and all the cattle gone.

"What! what!" he exclaimed, rubbing his eyes. "I must 'a' left them bars down last night!"

He went to look for his cattle and found the herd at midday, but a yoke of fat oxen which he had been intending to drive to market in a few days was missing.

Corsen was not at the time at work for Dexter, and no suspicion fell upon him.

Dexter was a member of the vigilance committee. He notified at once the proper officers of the society, and Blackman, their captain, was sent for. He was a keen, courageous young farmer, tall and smooth faced.

At dark the riders reported to him for duty. Dexter joined them.

"The thief," said Blackman, "has either taken the oxen to the city and sold them or he has hidden them on the island. It is more likely that he went to town with them; nowadays they want the money as soon as they can get it."

A night ride of twenty-five miles brought them to the city. There were in the place at that time a dozen or more cattle dealers, including butchers. Each of them was visited and closely questioned, but without any practical result. Not one of them reported having seen the stolen oxen.

"We will look 'em up," said Blackman.

He knew that nearly every butcher had a pasture of some sort, as near to the city as possible, where he kept the beef cattle he had on hand. He knew that some of the dealers were dishonest and occasionally received stolen property.

As quietly as possible the riders began the search, going from one pasture to another. Just at nightfall, in a pasture which belonged to a German butcher, they found the missing oxen. Dexter identified them, took his property and started them into the city.

So much was accomplished, but it was now necessary to find the thief.

When the German butcher was confronted with the oxen, he rolled his eyes in evident distress. However, he was not disposed to give up the cattle.

"I haf bought dose oxens ten days pefore," he declared doggedly.

"See here, my friend," said Blackman, "it will do you no good to lie about this business. These oxen were stolen night before last. They are fully identified. You bought them yesterday morning. Now, sir, you answer our questions—tell us the truth, remember—or we'll have you in jail in less than half an hour."

"Py Shorge!" whined the man. "Ven I haf known dot dose oxens vas stoled, I puys dem not."

"We understand that. But tell us what sort of man it was you bought them of."

Thoroughly terrified and convinced that Blackman could find out whatever he desired, the butcher told the whole story.

"I dells you true," he said. "Dot man vas a young fellar, short und t'ick, mit black hair und eyes und a grooked nose."

"Corsen!" the men exclaimed.

Further questioning served to strengthen the impression that the thief was Corsen. To find and arrest him was the next thing to be done.

It was found that he generally staid with a young man of his acquaintance at a cabin thirty miles down the river from the city. An old woman, an aunt of Corsen's crony, kept house for them.

The cabin stood at the foot of one of the high, rock crested Mississippi bluffs and within a stone's throw of the river bank.

Anticipating trouble in making the arrest, Blackman called out a few more men on his way down the river. There was another all night ride, wearying alike to men and horses. At the end of it Blackman's party, increased to a dozen men, dismounted and tied their horses a short distance from the cabin.

It was morning, but the sun had not yet risen. A gray mist hung over the valley, shutting out distant objects. The cabin itself was seen indistinctly, and showed no signs of any stir within.

The men surrounded it and Blackman advanced to the door and knocked. There was no response, but sounds of moving about were heard within.

"Open the door!" Blackman demanded.

Still there was no reply. Just as Blackman called for an ax that stood near, thinking to break in the door, it was opened by the old woman.

Blackman asked first for Corsen's crony.

"He's gone down the river. He went away a week ago," said the old woman.

"Where is Jim Corsen?"

"He's gone too."

Blackman entered the cabin. The woman, frightened, went out. Blackman noticed this movement.

It seemed absurd to think that any man would try to hide in so small a room. Two beds occupied nearly all of the space.

Blackman stepped into the center of the room, motioning to his followers to keep outside. In the ceiling of boards above his head, so low as to be within easy reach, was a square hole. But this aperture was closed, and the cover, when Blackman tried to push it aside, resisted his best efforts.

Again he called for the ax, and again he found its use unnecessary, for the board was shoved swiftly to one side, and Blackman suddenly found himself looking into the muzzle of a cocked revolver held within two feet of his face.

It was Corsen who held the revolver. He glared down at Blackman.

"Move a hand and you're a dead man!" he cried.

"Very well, sir; I'm here," said Blackman. He gazed unflinchingly at the revolver and into the eyes of the desperate man behind it.

"What are you here for?" said Corsen.

"To arrest you."

"For what?"

"For stealing Dexter's cattle."

Corsen uttered an oath. "I ain't a thief, and I won't be arrested!" he said.

"You are one against a dozen," said Blackman.

"What of that? I'll shoot the first man that makes a move."

"All right. Shoot me, and you'll still be taken in the end."

"Never! There ain't men enough in this county to take me alive."

"You might as well understand," said Blackman, speaking slowly, "that you will be taken—if not alive, then dead. You need not expect my men to come in here one at a time for you to shoot down at your leisure. Instead of that they will set fire to the house, and you will be roasted out only to be shot down like a dog."

"But what about you?" cried Corsen, with a triumphant gleam in his eyes. "I'll shoot you dead if they undertake that!"

"You will do as you please about that," replied Blackman. To see him one would have thought it was a matter of small consequence. "But the men will capture you just the same, and in that case they might not treat you well. I can't say what they would do."

Corsen could easily guess what would be done. In imagination he saw himself dangling from a limb of the nearest tree. The vision caused him to waver.

"What will you do with me if I surrender?" he asked.

"Deliver you up to the officers of the law."

"Will you swear it?"

"No. My word is good enough. I assure you that there will be neither hanging nor shooting done if you surrender."

"But you've got to swear it."

"I shall not swear it."

"I'll shoot if you don't!"

"Fire away!"

Corsen hesitated. Blackman, looking him steadily in the eye, saw that the time had come to take advantage of his hesitation.

"Turn that revolver the other end to, and give it to me!" he said. At the same time he held out his hand to receive it.

For two minutes the men glared at each other and neither spoke a word. Then Corsen slowly turned the revolver and gave it up.

"Now, come down!" said Blackman, instantly covering him with the weapon.

The fellow obeyed with alacrity. Thirty seconds later he was wearing a pair of handcuffs, and after that gave his captors no more trouble.

He was immediately taken to the county seat and lodged in jail. At his trial he was clearly identified by the German butcher. He was convicted and sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment at hard labor at Waupun.—Charles L. Wood

A GREAT SIGHT.

A Part of Missouri Where a "Strange Man-n" Is Very Rarely Seen.

A gentleman who was traveling across Possum ridge lost his way, and after wandering about the woods for some time finally struck a log trail which led him to an old log cabin which stood at the foot of a hill buried away among the bushes. The outside of the cabin was decorated with coonskins, and as the traveler approached a dozen long, lean dogs announced his presence. In a moment a man came around the corner of the cabin, and the traveler accosted him.

"I have lost my way," he said, "and I must trouble you for directions. I want to reach Beckett's Mill."

"Ah, hah," the man drawled, never for an instant removing his eyes from the stranger's face.

A moment passed.

"Well," said the traveler, "will you please direct me?"

"Ah, hah-h," the native drawled absently, and again relapsed into silence while he continued to stare.

"Well," resumed the stranger, "if you are going to direct me, I wish you would do so at once, as I am in a hurry."

"Ah, hah-h," and another long pause.

"Why don't you speak out?" the stranger asked a little testily. "Don't you understand what I want?"

"Ah, hah-h."

"The suffering Moses! Can't you say anything except 'Ah, hah'?"

"Ah, hah."

The stranger began to think he had found a lunatic or an idiot, and turned to ride away. Before he had gone a dozen steps, however, he heard the man call at the top of his voice, saying:

"Jake; oh, Jake!"

"Whut you want, pap-p?" a voice answered.

"Run here quick, Jake. Here's a man-n."

"A man-n!" Jake replied. "Whar is heem?"

"Heem jes' went down the road thar. Heem war a stranger, Jake!"

"Heem war?"

"Yas-s."

"An I didn't git to see heem, pap-p. Why'nt you uns call me sooner?"

"I war so tuck back by the sight 'o heem, Jake, thet I clean plumb lost my senses. I clear forgot 'bout you uns. Mebby ef you uns war to run atter heem you uns mout ketch up with heem. Mebby ef you uns called heem 'ud wait."

Jake climbed over the fence and started down the trail at full speed, at every jump calling:

"Oh, man! Mister man! Wait fer me, won't ye? Oh-h, man-n, I didn't git to see you uns. Wait fer me, won't ye?"

"What in the name of gracious do you mean?" the traveler cried, reining up his horse as Jake approached.

"I want to see you uns," Jake replied.

"What do you want to see me for?"

"'Ca'se you uns is strange."

"Well, I am only an ordinary man. Did you never see a man?"

"I hain't seed no strange man as I ken recollect."

"What's the difference between a strange man and any other?"

"Thar's a heap o' difference, I reckon."

"Well, take a good look at me now."

Jake, a great strapping big gawk, at least eighteen years old, clad in white tow trousers and a homespun linsey shirt, walked slowly around the stranger critically examining him from head to foot.

"Well, you have seen me pretty well now, haven't you?" the man asked.

"Ah, hah," Jake replied.

"Are you satisfied?"

"Ah, hah."

"Then I guess I may go on, eh?"

"Ah, hah."

"Very well. Say, why don't you come down to the county seat some day? You would see plenty of strangers there."

"Too fer."

"It's only fifteen miles."

"Too fer. I reckon I'd be shore to git lost."

"Well, goodby."

The stranger turned away and had gone about twenty yards when again he heard Jake calling:

"Oh, man-n," he said, "wait a minute, won't ye? Here comes mam. She hain't got to see you uns yit. An here's the young uns too. Wait till they all see you uns."

The stranger looked back and saw a bareheaded, barefooted woman and a dozen children coming toward him; then he turned and fled.—Missouri Cor. New York Tribune.

Learning A Language.

A woman who has been living in Paris tells of one of her bouts with the French language. "I used to be on the lookout constantly," she says, "for additions to my vocabulary, and I would make a mental note of every new word as so much extra capital. The landlord of our apartment died in the course of our residence under his roof, and I was interested to learn that the hired mourners were called croquemorts. Unfortunately, the same day I also learned that crachoir meant cuspidor, and got the two associated in my mind.

"Several weeks after, my husband having broken the cuspidor in our rooms, I undertook to replace it. They are not in common use in Paris, but I remembered to have seen some in an out of the way corner of a certain shop. Fancy the polite Frenchman's consternation when I asked in my best French for a 'small, graceful, prettily decorated hired mourner—one that I could take to America with me!'"—New York Times.

Wrote "a Bad Hand."

During the war a paper from General Meigs passed through the hands of General Sherman, and is today preserved with this indorsement upon it in General Sherman's well known hand:

"I heartily concur in the recommendation of the quartermaster general, but I don't know what he says."—Youth's Companion.

Checks Dated on Sunday.

A check dated on Sunday is not necessarily void, but is open to suspicion. It is doubtful if any bank would cash such a check if attention was directed to the date, and few men of ordinary common sense would so date a check.—New York Herald.

Of Course.

Mrs. Wickwire—Let me have half of the paper, Henry, please.

Mr. Wickwire—Which half do you want?

Mrs. Wickwire—The better half, dear.

And he handed her the "woman" half of course.—Indianapolis Journal.

He Was Absentminded.

He is one of those youths who seem brighter than they really are. He had never clerked in a dry goods and furnishing store, but his favorable appearance and indorsements concerning his honesty secured him a position. He was to act as assistant to the gentleman in charge of the ladies' hosiery department. The second day after he began work the clerk in charge of the counter was ill, and failed to put in an appearance. The new man felt that he was fully competent to run the business.

A very beautiful young lady approached him and remarked:

"I bought some stockings of the gentleman in charge of this department yesterday and, if you please, I should like to change them."

There was something about the young lady's beauty that fascinated and bewildered him as he hastily responded:

"Er—yes'm, but I presume you had better not attempt it here. The ladies' toilet and waiting rooms are on the next floor above."

Of course his incivility was reported and he was discharged, and all because he was impressible and absentminded.—Chicago Times.

The Lion of St. Mark.

The symbol of the Venetian republic—the famous Lion of St. Mark—which, after being restored, has been replaced on its column in the Piazzetta at Venice, is made of bronze. There is a tradition among the Venetian people that its eyes are diamonds; they are really white agates, faceted. Its mane is most elaborately wrought, and its retracted, gaping mouth and its fierce mustaches give it an oriental aspect.

The creature as it now stands belongs to many different epochs, varying from some date previous to our era down to this century. It is conjectured that it may have originally formed a part of the decoration of some Assyrian palace. St. Mark's lion it certainly was not originally, for it was made to stand level upon the ground, and had to be raised up in front to allow the evangel to be slipped under its forepaws.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Corded Trunks in Theatrical Companies.

Trunks corded instead of strapped are thought by some managers to be fatal to the interests of their companies. "I can't have any hangman's ropes among my people," exclaimed one well known farce-comedy manager on noticing cords upon one of the trunks belonging to a lady he had just brought at large expense from east to west. And such a horror had he of the "hoodoo" effect upon his company, were a woman addicted to such methods to remain a member of it, that he quietly paid the astonished newcomer two weeks' salary, adding her fare back to New York by way of compensation for discharging her.—Chicago Post.

A Poor Performance.

Young Hopeful—Mamma, did you tell papa I'd got to have a bicycle?

Mamma—Yes, but he said he couldn't afford it.

"Course he'd say that; but what did you do?"

"I argued in favor of it, but he refused."

"Argued! Huh! If it ud been anything you wanted for your own self you'd a cried a little, an then you'd got it."—Good News.

What Government Is.

Governing does not consist in allowing disorder to happen and then punishing it. It consists in seeing every smallest wandering of attention at its very beginning and so preventing disorder. To do this the teacher must be conscious of every pupil at every second. Nothing is easier than this when one can do it.—Harper's.

The Way of the World.

"There go the Spicer Wilcoxes, mamma! I'm told they're dying to know us. Hadn't we better call?"

"Certainly not, dear! If they're dying to know us, they're not worth knowing. The only people worth our knowing are the people who don't want to know us."—London Tit-Bits.

A Yankee in Paris.

A Yankee was puzzling over a placard in the Rue St. Honore, the last line of which was: Special pour la coiffure des dames. To another Yankee, who happened along, he said it was something about coffer dams, but he'd be blest if he knew what.—New York Sun.

Cheesemaking in Canada has enormously improved within recent years as a result of the method of instruction which has been promoted by the government in sending competent instructors among the cheesemakers.

EXPOSURE TO CHANGES OF TEMPERATURE.

Public men are constantly liable to danger arising from sudden changes of temperature; sometimes from heat to cold, sometimes the reverse.

Henry Thorne, Traveling Secretary of the Y.M.C.A., writes from Exeter Hall, Strand, London, February 2, 1888:

"I desire to bear my testimony to the value of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. I have used them for pains in the back and side arising from rheumatic and other causes never without deriving benefit from the application. They are easily applied and very comforting. Those engaged as I am in public work which involves exposure to sudden changes of temperature, will do well to keep a supply of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in their portmanteaus."

MUSCLE AND VIGOR—A DIFFERENCE.

Many muscular men succumb to fatigues borne with ease by persons far their inferiors in physical strength. Muscle does not imply vigor. In fact, it is not difficult of proof that athletes do not live as long nor enjoy as good health as the average individual who is vigorous—that is to say, whose digestion and sleep are unimpaired, whose nerves are tranquil, and who has no organic tendency to disease. These requisites of vigor are conferred upon those inherently weak, no less than upon those debilitated through wasting disease, by a thorough, persistent course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the leading national tonic, indorsed and recommended by physicians of eminence. It will not endow you with a muscle of a Corbett, but it will infuse energy into your system, and renew the active and healthful performance of its functions. It averts and cures malarial, rheumatic and kidney complaints, and overcomes dyspepsia, constipation, liver trouble and nervousness.

Kinetoscope and Kinetograph.

The terms kinetoscope and kinetograph are readily confused by the uninitiated. The former term applies only to the animated but soundless image. The kinetograph, on the other hand, is an instrument intended to reproduce motion and sound simultaneously, being a combination of a specially constructed camera and phonograph. The camera used by Edison with this instrument will take 46 pictures a second, corresponding to 2,760 pictures a minute, or 165,600 in an hour.

The rapid photographing of these pictures upon a long band of extremely light, sensitive film creates the illusory spectacle of real motion of the figures, and when, to this visual impression, the phonograph is called to join its voice we have a combination of effects upon both auditory and optic nerves. This specially constructed camera is attached electrically to a phonograph, and their combined movements are simultaneously registered, and thus we have the duplex sensation of vision and sound. It will be seen that the above principles are based upon the familiar toy known as the zoetrope, or wheel of life.—Cassier's Magazine.

Was Prepared.

"Do you die contented?" was asked by a minister of a citizen whose earthly accounts were being balanced.

"Oh, happily!"

"You believe that you will receive a crown above?"

"Don't know."

"Do you believe in the resurrection?"

"Don't know, parson," and he smiled.

"But why are you happy?"

"Because I have taken advantage of the three days of grace."

"His mind is wandering," said the minister aside.

"No, I'll be blamed if it is. You see, I have a note in bank. It is due. By the time the three days' grace expire I will be dead. Oh, let me laugh!"

"But can't they go on your security?"

"He's dead. Oh, let me laugh again!"—Texas Siftings.

A Pert Young Princess.

The English royal children when young were attended in illness by old Dr. Brown of Windsor. Probably on account of the unpalatable doses he gave them the doctor was not popular with the little princes and princesses. They accordingly took great delight in calling him "Brown," to the utter ignoring of his title and also the great indignation of their royal mamma. The queen took them apart on one of these occasions and said that the next one who offended in that way should be dispatched to bed. Dr. Brown came soon again. The little princess royal knew he was coming. She also knew that her mother had meant what she said. It had no deterring effect. She walked into the room and promptly remarked:

"Good morning, Brown. Good evening, Brown. I am going to bed." And to bed she went before any one had a chance to send her.—New York Sun.

Noses and Mouths to Order.

A "doctor" in this city, who beautifies the feminine face by making dimples to order, on being questioned by a reporter, explained that nose straightening went with dimple making, just as hair cutting went with shaving, and the business also included mouth ensmalling. He remarked that any one coming into the world blessed with a turned up nose or a large mouth was not in this age of progress excusable for letting it remain in its deformed state. He could reduce the mouth from a large size to the merest rosebud or straighten a turned up nose until it looked severely classical.—San Francisco Examiner.

Had Slain His Thousand.

At Bald Rock, 60 miles from Fresno, John Rose killed a grizzly bear which had been roaming about that region for nearly 15 years and was called "Bigfoot" by miners in that vicinity. It is estimated that he has killed 1,000 sheep in his time and has had many fights with Chinese sheep herders. He carried scars to show it, for when he was cut open seven bullets were found in his carcass. They had been fired into him in past years. He was killed in a canyon and could not be got out, but those who saw him estimated his weight at 2,000 pounds. His hide was a good load for two men to carry out.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Sun Surgery.

Some years ago a London surgeon, by using the sun's rays, succeeded in removing a wine mark from the face of a lady and also succeeded in destroying a malignant growth with the same remedy. The wound healed readily, and up to the time the article was published there had been no symptoms of the disease returning.—Jenness Miller Monthly.

THICKLY SETTLED.

A Section of New York City That is Very Densely Populated.

350,000 PEOPLE PACKED TOGETHER.

No Other Place on Earth has so Many Inhabitants in One Square Mile.—Crowded Tenements.

One square mile of New York city's area, inclusive of streets and public squares, has a population of more than 350,000. It is possible to plot on the map an irregular district covering a territory of a square mile which will have a population of half a million, but to do that one would have to zigzag over the map, picking out thickly populated blocks. It is not possible to plot an area with a population of more than 400,000 living in a compact and contiguous territory. That population of more than 350,000 to a square mile is not exceeded anywhere else. It is the most thickly populated spot on the earth.

The large population is possible because the builders and real estate owners of New York are more modern and more inventive than those in European cities. The densely populated tenements in New York are not usually the property of estates, handed down from generation to generation, like the property of the Astors and the Duke of Westminister, the largest real estate owner in London. No man can manage a large block of tenement property so well as several small owners can. He will not get much revenue from it, and he will not see that it is filled with tenants; neither will he improve it so promptly.

The most thickly populated quarter of New York is owned by hundreds of men and many comparatively small estates. The owners, or agents, give their whole time to the management of property, and whenever they can get a rate of income 1 or 2 per cent. higher they will tear down an old building and put up the modern tenement in its stead. They cannot afford to let their land lie idle and pay their taxes and assessments on it for its prospective profits, as do the large landowners of Manhattan island. Many of the owners have bought tenements with their savings in the same neighborhood where they made their money. The tax rolls show that a large share of the tenement property is owned by men of foreign names and birth who came to New York as poor immigrants and now own the property where more recent immigrants live, and where the owners store as many of them as they can and charge as much rent as they can get.

No known form of habitation will hold more people than the lower class lodging houses and cheap tenements on the east side and the west side between Ninth and Twelfth avenues. Neither Chinatown, in San Francisco, the lowest quarters of an Asiatic city, nor the slums of London or Paris will hold so many people to the acre, because three and four story buildings are comparatively rare in either place, while a five story tenement is seldom known. In the poorer quarters of London the owners spend little money on improvements when they are not compelled to by the health authorities, because any expenditure for improvements would have to come out of their income at first, and they do not want their incomes curtailed.

The most densely populated square mile in New York does not include Five Points and Chinatown. It might be made to zigzag over to the Tombs, taking in Pell and Dover streets, the Mulberry bend and Baxter bay, but Paradise park, the Tombs, the new criminal court house, and the numerous intersecting streets in that neighborhood take up so much of the space that the section is not so thickly populated as that near Stanton and Rivington streets, where Avenue C begins, and down Pitt, Ridge, Essex, Ludlow and the other east side streets which stop at Houston street. Close by Houston street and Avenue C is the most thickly settled block, with a rate of population of more than a million to the mile.

The most thickly populated square mile includes the whole of the Eighth assembly district, all of the Twelfth except the three election districts along the water front, all of the Sixth west of Lewis street, all of the Fourth except the five districts along the East river, and all of the Tenth and Fourteenth except the ten election districts between Second avenue and the Bowery and Third avenue. It includes Tompkins square, which is as large as three avenue blocks and has no population, the small squares at the intersections of Canal street and the large manufactories. The exact boundaries are Fourteenth street, Second avenue, Houston street, the Bowery, Catharine street, Cherry street, Jackson street, Grand street for a block, Sixth street for a short block, and Avenue D back to Fourteenth street.

In that district, not counting the squares and places at the intersections or diagonal streets, are 226 blocks, most of them small blocks, the whole averaging less than 500 feet one way by 200 feet the other way; 21 in the Fourteenth district, 34 in the Twelfth, 30 in the Tenth, 56 in the Eighth, 43 in the Sixth, 42 in the Fourth. The population of that area is: Fourth district, 60,868; Sixth, 64,327; Eighth, 89,262; Tenth, 44,493; Twelfth, 54,148; Fourteenth, 38,006, making a total of more than 350,000.

The Twelfth and Eighth districts average 1,600 people to the block, while the highest average population to the block is in the Fourteenth district, around Tompkins square. The larger number of people around Tompkins square is accounted for by the larger size of the blocks, as they are all avenue blocks from 650 to 700 feet in length, while further down town the blocks are not two-thirds that size. The most densely populated neighborhood is at the upper part of the Sixth district and the lower part of the Tenth district, around Rivington, Stanton and Houston streets.

His Apt Reply.

Countess ——, who is an American by birth and a delegate to the Columbian exposition from a foreign country, applied for a complimentary card of admission not long ago. The official to whom she spoke of the matter explained to her that it would be impossible for him to issue a card, because if it were lost he had no way of tracing it.

"A photographic pass is much better," he said, "as it can be readily traced. Such passes," he added, "are used by all members of the board of lady managers."

The countess objected to having her picture taken for a photographic pass on the ground that she was a titled personage, and it would not be in conformity with etiquette.

"Well," replied the official, by way of persuasion, "my mother is a member of the board of lady managers, and when she comes to Chicago next week she will have her picture taken just like the other members."

"But you see," said the lady, "I am a countess."

"Yes, I know," retorted the official, "and my mother is a queen."

The countess stamped her foot and without another word turned and left the office.—Youth's Companion.

President Arthur's Amiability.

Julian Ralph relates the following as an instance of the late President Arthur's amiability. The incident occurred at the Thousand Islands:

"On that occasion I had sent off my dispatch and returned to the hotel at 2 o'clock in the morning, to find all the doors locked and all the lights, except those in the president's suit of rooms, gone out like the Israelites from Egypt. Captain R. F. Coffin, now part of a treasured memory, and Mr. Macdona were with me, and we battered at a side door to wake the servants.

"In time the door was opened by the president of the United States. Knowing him only as a journalist must know all men, without too much awe of place or power, we yet were chagrined at having disturbed and brought to the door a president, and particularly one of so charming a personality as his, and we begged his pardon.

"'Why, that's all right,' he said. 'You wouldn't have got in till morning if I had not come. No one is up in the house but me. I could have sent my colored boy, but he had fallen asleep, and I hated to wake him.'"

An Embarrassing Incident.

A bride tells of a difficult moment of her recent wedding trip. A few days of it were spent with an uncle of hers, very deaf and very pious.

When they sat down to dinner on the night of their arrival, with a considerable company of relatives assembled to do them honor, the uncle exploded a bombshell by asking the groom to say grace.

Much embarrassed, as he was unaccustomed to officiating in this way, he leaned forward, murmuring a request to be excused, whereupon the uncle, watching him, only waited until his lips stopped moving to utter a sonorous "Amen!" in response.

It is hardly necessary to add that not only did the blessing for that meal go unsaid, but also that the effort of everybody, except the uncle, to keep from laughing quite took away the appetites for the first course.—New York Times.

Whistling Fireworks.

The people of London are very much interested in the whistling fireworks, which have long ceased to be regarded over here as a pyrotechnic marvel. The popular notion among the Britons is that gas generated by the combustion of the fiery composition actually blows a whistle, but this supposition is erroneous. So far as can be determined by the pyrotechnists themselves, the screaming noise is due to the violent combustion of the picrate of potash with which the little tubes of the fireworks are stuffed. Experiments have been made with other materials, but picrate of potash is the only combustible substance discoverable that will give anything more than a faint imitation of a whistle.—New York World.

Modest Boston.

A well known professor of English at Harvard, who had just returned from a two weeks' trip to Chicago, was asked what he thought of the place as compared with the big eastern cities.

"In Chicago," was the answer, "the men you meet are not gentlemen, and they don't pretend to be. In New York you meet the same sort of people, with the single difference that they do pretend to be gentlemen. In Boston you meet gentlemen."—Boston Herald.

FEEDING INDIANS.

How Uncle Sam's Wards are Given Supplies on the Reservations.

SIGHTS ON "BEEF ISSUE" DAY.

Shrunken Cattle Distributed to Hungry Savages.—Awful Torture of Inoffensive Creatures.

There were not over 300 Indians there, although they represented several thousand others, who remained in the different camps scattered over the reservation, wherever water and timber and bluffs to shield them best from the wind were to be found in common. Each steer is calculated to supply twenty-five Indians with beef for two weeks, or from 1½ to 2 pounds of beef a day; this is on the supposition that the steers average 1,000 to 1,200 pounds. The steers I saw issued weighed about 500 pounds, and when they tried to run, stumbled with the weakness of starvation. They were nothing but hide and ribs and two horns. They were driven four at a time through a long chute, and halted at the gate at the end of it until their owners' names were marked off the list.

The Indians were gathered in front of the gate in long rows, or in groups of ten or twelve, sitting easily in their saddles, and riding off leisurely in bunches of four as their names were called out, and as their cattle were started off with a parting kick into the open prairie. The Apaches, Comanches, Delawares and Towacomies drove their share off toward their camps; the Caddoes and the Kiowas, who live near the agency, and who were served last, killed theirs, if they chose to do so, as soon as they left the pen. A man in charge of the issue held a long paper in his hand and called out, "Eckhoos-cho, Pe-an-voon-it, Hoos-cho and Cho-noo-chy," which meant that Red Bird, Large Looking Glass, The Bird and Deer Head were to have the next four steers. His assistant, an Indian policeman, with "God helps them who help themselves" engraved on his brass buttons, with the figure of an Indian toiling at a plow in the center, repeated these names aloud and designated which steer was to go to which Indian. A beef issue is not a pretty thing to watch.

Why the government does not serve its meat with the throats cut, as any reputable butcher would do it, is not possible to determine. It seems to prefer, on the contrary, that the Indian should exhibit his disregard for the suffering of animals and his bad marksmanship at the same time. When the representatives of the more distant tribes had ridden off, chasing their beef before them, the Caddoes and Kiowas gathered close around the gate of the pen, with the boys in front. They were handsome, mischievous boys, with leather leggings, colored green and blue, and with silver buttons down the side, and beaded buckskin shirts. They sat two on each pony, and each held his bow and arrows, and as the steers came stumbling blindly out into the open, they let the arrows drive from a distance of ten feet into the animals' flanks and necks, where they stuck quivering.

Then the Indian boys would yell and their fathers, who had hunted buffaloes with arrows, smiled approvingly. The arrows were not big enough to kill, they merely hurt, and the steer would rush off into a clumsy gallop for fifty yards, when its owner would raise his Winchester and make the dust spurt up around it, until one bullet would reach a leg and the steer would stop for an instant, with a desperate toss of its head, and stagger forward again on three.

The dogs, to the number of twenty or more, were around it by this time in a snarling, leaping pack, and the owner would try again, and wound it perhaps in the flank and it would lurch over heavily like a drunken man, shaking its head from side to side and tossing its horns at the dogs, who bit at the place where the blood ran and snapped at its legs. Sometimes it would lie there for an hour, until it bled to death, or again it would scramble to its feet and the dogs would start off in a panic of fear after a more helpless victim.

It was the most unsportsmanlike and wantonly cruel exhibition I have ever seen. A bull in a ring has a fighting chance and takes it, but these animals, who were too weak to stand and too frightened to run, staggered about until the Indians had finished torturing them, and then, with blood spurting from their mouths, would pitch forward and die, and they had to be quick about it before the squaws began cutting off the hide while the flanks were still heaving.

The government either purchases steers for the Indians a few weeks before an issue or three or four months previous to it, feeding them meanwhile on the government reservation. The latter practice is much more satisfactory to the contractor, as it saves him the cost and care of these cattle during the winter, and the inevitable loss which must ensue in that time through illness and starvation. Those I saw had been purchased in October, and had been weighed and branded at that time with the government brand. They were then allowed to roam over the government reservation until the spring, when they had fallen off in weight from one-third to one-half.

They were then issued at their original weight. That is, a steer which in October was found to weigh 1,100 pounds, and which would supply twenty or more people with meat, was supposed to have kept this weight throughout the entire winter, and was issued at 1,100, although it had not 300 pounds of flesh on its bones. The agent is not to blame for this. This is the fault of the government, and it is quite fair to suppose that some one besides the contractor benefits by the arrangement. When the beef is issued two weeks after the contract has been made, it can and frequently is rejected by the army officer in charge of the issue if he thinks it is unfit.

But the officers present at the issue I saw were as helpless as they were indignant, for the beef had weighed the weight credited to it once when it was paid for, and the contractor had saved the expense of keeping it, and the Indian received just one-fourth of the meat due him, and for which he paid in land.—Richard H. Davis in Harper's Weekly.

AND IMPUDENT JOURNALIST.

How He Tantalizingly Turned the Tables on an Irate Judge.

Even the imperturbable American "newspaper man" could not surpass the sang froid displayed recently by a well known London journalist. This gentleman was cited to appear as a witness in a case and waited until his patience was exhausted, when he called out to a friend, who was also in the antechamber, that if he were not summoned within five minutes he should go away. This was overheard by the judge of the court, who happened to be passing during a temporary adjournment. Addressing the journalist in a passion of offended dignity, he said:

"You will stay here as long as I see fit to keep you. You appear to be ignorant of the power of the law. Are you aware that if I were to summon Prince George to appear before me tomorrow and he refused I could have him arrested?"

With the most innocent air in the world the journalist replied, "If I were you, sir, I would not arrest such an important personage, who, in addition to being heir presumptive to the throne of England, is also the Duke of York and occupies a high position in the navy."

"You don't understand me," said the judge impatiently. "I said if I chose I"——

"Of course you will do as you please in the matter," said the other phlegmatically, "but to arrest Prince George is a serious matter."

"I never had the least intention"——

"And besides," continued the journalist, "there will be trouble when his royal highness the Prince of Wales learns that you intend to arrest his eldest son."

"Oh, stupid!" cried the judge.

"However, that is your own affair," went on this diabolical journalist. "I am much obliged to you for telling me of your intentions. As soon as I am free I shall hurry to the office with the exclusive news that Prince George is to be arrested tomorrow. It is tomorrow you intend arresting him, is it not?"

But the judge had heard enough. In despair he turned on his heel, and calling out, "Idiot! Imbecile!" fled, leaving the journalist standing, with a sardonic smile on his lips.—Cleveland Moffett in New York Recorder.

Boyle O'Reilly's Swordsmanship.

Boyle O'Reilly was a skilled swordsman. He told me that when he first came a fugitive to this country he thought he would maintain himself by giving lessons in broadsword, single stick and foils, and it used to give him great pleasure to put a foil in my hands and say to me—for I profess to know nothing of it—"Ned, on guard! Now, run me through. Thrust me anywhere you can. Kill me if you can." And then, with a smile upon his face, he would ward off my lunges, until suiting his purpose, he would send my sword flying across the room. Often on our excursions he would say to me, "Ned, take that stick and cut me down." He wanted no play about it. He wanted an earnest fight, and complying with his wishes I would often rush at him with a stout stick in my hand only to have him laughingly repel my attack, and these affairs generally wound up by his giving me a whack over the shoulders that nearly broke me in two.—Donahoe's Magazine.

The T Girders Used by the Romans.

In discussing the use of iron on a large scale by the Romans, Mr. Gardner writes: "From Pompeii we might infer the total absence of constructive ironwork in Roman architecture, yet Professor Aitchison claims that in the baths of Caracalla a large ceiling was supported on iron girders." This fact might be stated less doubtfully than these words would imply, since some tons of broken iron T girders were found a few years ago during the excavation of the great cella solaris of the Therma of Caracalla. These girders had been cased in bronze, and they were arranged so as to form square panels, which were filled in with concrete decorated with mosaic and delicate stucco reliefs, all colored and gilt, thus forming a strong and richly decorated flat ceiling, with a span of enormous width.—Saturday Review.

Boarding Plants.

"What do you want for that palm?" asked a man of a florist, pointing at the same time to a tall and healthy kentia. "That isn't for sale," replied the florist; "it's a boarder." "A what?" "A boarder—sent here to be taken care of while the folks are away. Yes, we have quite a number of such things. A couple of months under glass does them good, and they get watered and looked after. A $50 palm would be ruined by leaving it in the back yard while its owners were on their vacation."—New York Sun.

Letters of Introduction to People on the Other Side are Useless.—Old World Hospitality.

Inasmuch as a very large proportion of the American tourists consists of persons who have never visited the Old World before, hints not contained in the ordinary guidebooks may prove both of use and interest. I wish, however, to emphasize the fact that they are addressed not to old and experienced travelers, but to people who are making the trip to Europe for the first time.

Nearly all of these neophytes, if I may be permitted to describe them as such, have taken the precaution to provide themselves with letters of introduction, upon which they invariably base more or less extravagant hopes of hospitable reception and social successes. This is unfortunate. For unless the letters in question happen to be addressed to Americans resident abroad, their bearers will in nine cases out of ten often be exposed to bitter disappointment and mortification. Society in England, France, Germany, Italy and Spain is thoroughly selfish, and the majority of its members resent the arrival of a letter of introduction on account of the obligations involved thereby.

Their one object is to dispose of the latter as speedily as possible, with the least possible expenditure of money, time and trouble. Of course I am speaking here of letters of introduction written by people who are on terms of intimate acquaintance and friendship with those to whom the missives are addressed. For there is quite a large class of individuals who make a practice of giving to their friends letters of introduction addressed to persons with whom they possess only the very slightest possible acquaintance, or else whom they do not even know at all.

Nor should the American tourist visiting Europe for the first time look for very much in the shape of a return for the generous hospitality with which he has received European tourists in the United States. Hospitality in the Old World, save in Russia and in Scandanavia, is of a far more stunted, narrow and grudging character than in the New, and whereas here on this side of the Atlantic it is regarded as a pleasure, across the sea it is looked upon as an obligation. In America a foreign visitor, if well recommended, can travel by easy stages from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Canadian border to the Mexican gulf without ever being permitted to set his foot in a hotel.

He will be passed on from one house to another, and be made to feel everywhere that by his presence he is conferring a pleasure upon his entertainers. Let the latter visit Europe, and they will find the guest who made his home at their house for days, weeks and even months will consider that he has made an adequate return for all their lavish hospitality if he invites them perfunctorily to a dinner party or sends them tickets for the opera on an off night. Fortunate, indeed, if he does not endeavor to avoid making any return whatsoever.

Of course there are some exceptions—some cases where people on the other side honor to their full extent letters of introduction, or endeavor to make ample returns for hospitality received. But they are the exception, and it will be found that the Americans whom they entertain are mostly either enormously rich or else possessed of altogether extraordinary brilliancy of intellect.

The greatest care should be exercised by those who visit the Old World for the first time in making acquaintances and in forming friendships. In the eyes of the ordinary European the very fact of being an American implies the possession of vast wealth. Tourists hailing from this side of the Atlantic are credited with a practically illimitable supply of dollars. This the American discovers, to his cost, at the hotels and shops which he favors with his patronage. It likewise, however, serves to render him a center of attract on to all that great class of ne'er-do-wells who live upon their own wits and upon the credulity of the persons with whom they happen to become acquainted.

Many of them bear high sounding titles that are perfectly authentic, and it is against these people in particular that I would wish to warn those of my readers going abroad for the first time. Don't for one moment imagine that the mere possession of a title is sufficient to endow its bearer with social eminence and prestige. There are hordes of Russian princes, Italian marquises, Spanish dukes, Portuguese viscounts, German and French counts and barons, and even a goodly number of English people with handles to their names, who are absolutely without any social consideration or standing whatsoever, and whose presence would not be tolerated in any respectable drawing room or club in Europe.

It is just these individuals who are forever on the lookout for the inexperienced American tourist, whom they hope to dazzle by their titles sufficiently to convert him at any rate temporarily into their banker. Independently of the pecuniary expense which association with titled rooks of this character involves, there is likewise another social side of the question to be considered. For the mere fact of being seen in the company of men or women of this class is often sufficient to destroy all chances of social success in the Old World, and to close against the American visitor doors that would otherwise have been opened to their utmost width.—New York Tribune.

Ocean Depths.

A newspaper item announcing the arrival of the United States fishery steamer Albatross at Victoria, B. C., says that vessel claims to have made the deepest sea soundings ever known off the coast of Alaska.

The depth reached was 4,500 fathoms. There is a mistake somewhere. Either the Albatross is reported wrongly or those giving the information are a bit "off" as far as past records are concerned.

A depth of 4,500 fathoms is less by 61 fathoms than at one place north of Porto Rico and 155 fathoms short of another lying off the northeast coast of Japan.—Rehoboth Herald.

Telegraph Poles in England.

The English telegraph lineman doesn't mount high into the air, bug fashion, on the poles in order to get at the wires. He doesn't have to. The wires are strung on short poles that stand perpendicular, and wires and poles do not present that cyclone wrecked appearance which characterizes many of the American lines.—New York Sun.

PERFECT STREET PAVING.

Its Incalculable Influence on Health, Sanitation and Property Values.

It is only in American cities having a population of more than 10,000 that less than one-third of the total length of streets has been paved in any manner. If the construction of new pavements on the remaining 24,838 miles of streets in such cities proceeds as rapidly as now seems probable, the expenditures for this work in the next 10 years will aggregate upward of $1,000,000,000. It is doubtful if more than 60 per cent of the streets of these cities would then be well paved.

From a well paved street abutting real estate derives on increased value hardly ever less and often many times more than the cost apportioned to it. It is therefore right that abutting property should, as it does in most American cities, bear the cost of the construction of a pavement, which becomes at once a substantial improvement, having a salable value on which the property owner alone can realize. The benefits are shared to some extent by adjacent property which may not abut on the street, but it is doubtful if a fair and practicable apportionment of the cost could be carried beyond the border line, though the justice of this restriction is almost intolerably strained when one paved street is compelled to bear the travel that would pass over others if put in equally good condition.

All calculations of the economies and profits of paved streets fail to encompass the sum of gain from them, because there is much involved that is intangible in character. The benefits of better sanitary conditions, with the consequent productiveness resulting from good health, the saving of expenses for medicines and the professional services of physicians; the prolonging in some cases of lives that might succumb to the deleterious influences inherent in bad streets—all are incalculable, nor can be estimated the farreaching effects of the retarded development of a city due to failure to provide good streets.

The common mistake of regarding the cost of a street pavement as a merely luxurious expense, rather than as a profitable improvement, has, more than anything else, deterred the work of putting the roadways of our American cities and towns in proper condition, and it should be added has hindered progress and prosperity immeasurably. It has also had a mischievous influence when coupled with false ideas of economy in causing mere cheapness in cost to become with a deplorably large number of people the main desideratum when they find that paving cannot longer be deferred. A record of the failures that it has inevitably led to since the beginning of experiments in roadmaking would tell about all of the history of paving that is worth knowing.—Century.

The Infancy of Electricity.

With all the progress that has been made sanguine men are of opinion that the world is yet on the threshold of electrical experiment, and that with the aid of this magic power of nature results will be produced surpassing what is now deemed impossible. Every patent that is issued represents a new idea, a new application of electricity or a new method for its production. For every patent that is granted a dozen are rejected, and each application is the result of numerors experiments. Thousands are busied wresting the innermost secrets of that power and in finding new ways of turning them to the uses of mankind. The age of steam propulsion which was ushered in 100 years ago has been followed by the age of electricity, which in less than 20 years has already accomplished marvels. Achievement is so rapid and so continuous in this domain of human effort that imagination can scarcely keep pace with it.—New York Telegram.

Connecticut's Negro Governor.

The negroes of Connecticut were formerly accustomed to elect a governor for themselves. "Negro election," as it was called, generally took place on the Saturday following the election day of the whites. Just what the negro governor's duties and privileges were does not appear. At all events, he was respected as "gubernor" by the negroes throughout the state. The custom was established before the Revolutionary war and was continued as late as 1820.—Youth's Companion.

Wasted Politeness.

A very careful man is Old Guzzler, who has traveled through Italy and been pestered out of his life by beggars. He reaches Pisa and goes to see the leaning tower. He is loaded with wine to the roots of his hair. After gazing at the tower for a moment, he exclaims:

"Yes, you're very polite and you can bow to me as much as you want to, but you won't get one blessed halfpenny."—London Tit-Bits.

Her Triumph.

A well brought up child was seen secretly to purloin and pocket an orange from the laid out dinner table, but was afterward seen to enter the empty room and secretly again return it to the dish and triumphantly exclaim, "Sold again, satan!"—Almanac.

FRIDAY, APRIL 6 1894

When George Washington died in 1799 he was reputed to be the richest man in the United States. Yet his wealth was estimated at but $600,000. That was less than 100 years ago, a very short time in the history of a nation. How are matters to-day? Why we have in the United States hundreds of persons with fortunes ten times that of Washington's. John D. Rockefeller, the notorious Standard oil monopolist, is said to have an annual income of $12,000,000, a sum twenty times greater than the entire Washington estate. Can any sane person deny the fact that class legislation has not been the prominent cause of these enormous aggregations of wealth? Can any one fail to see that the more millionaires, the greater danger menaces our Democratic institutions? Whenever it is proposed to reduce the protective tariff it is significant that the first to raise a howl of dismay is the millionaire manufacturer. That howl doesn't come from the poor farmer or laborer. The millionaires grow fat by class legislation. Take that away and he loses his rotundity. The United States has all the millionaires it needs. We should turn our attention to some other industry, to the making of a more contented, prosperous yeomanry. Low tariffs, postal saving banks, a stable currency, and a uniform taxation of land alone will aid in reaching some more desirable condition than we are at present enjoying.

Colonel Breckenridge used to be a frequent talker in church and his eloquential piety pointed the way of salvation to many, while he seems himself to have ambled along unconcernedly in the broad and dusty path to the bad place. It is now stated that no Presbyterian church in Kentucky admits that he is or ever was a member of it, notwithstanding he used to worship quite regularly and talk beautifully about the rewards of a virtuous and correct life. It is hoped that during the tribulations which now beset the eloquent Kentuckian he will not forget that "while the lamp holds out to burn the vilest sinner may return" and make a personal application of the information.

When Republican journals gloat over the exhausted condition of the United States Treasury and "point with pride" to it as the result of Democratic administration of affairs, let every one remember that up to the first of March, 1894, nineteen million dollars had been paid out of that Treasury to men who had made sugar in the United States, and that this money was taken out of the pockets of the great mass of laboring people, not to pay for sugar for their own use, but paid in the purchase of other necessaries of life which were taxed higher so that the revenue tax on sugar could be removed and the manufacturing monopolists thus have their unfair advantage over their customers increased accordingly. This bounty business exposes the fraud of the whole protective theory.

Constant agitation is needed to bring this country and the world to the right attitude on financial matters. The greatest enemy of silver, Gladstone, has practically retired from public life and his party to all appearances will shortly follow him. Should the Conservatives return to power the Right Honorable A. J. Balfour will be their leader in the House of Commons. He is an avowed and exceedingly able bimetallist. Herr Buenz, in an interview with a Chicago newspapar man, said that Germany will shortly make a movement in the interest of the white metal. Take it all in all, we may be assured that the good fight goes bravely on, and that ultimate victory is only a matter of time.

Representative Maguirre of San Francisco, author of the single tax bill before Congress, says: "I do not attach any importance to the Coxey movement itself. It will amount to nothing, but it is a symptom of growing conditions which is fraught with infinite danger to the popular government and to the institutions of liberty. It represents the growing discontent of the masses and the gradual loss of faith in republican governments. This movement is the natural outgrowth of existing conditions. It is the natural outgrowth of the monopoly of the resources of this country by the few, and the consequent wretchedness and helplessness of the masses."

RAILROAD SCRAP IRON.

It Is Carefully Saved, Assorted and Then Sold by the Companies.

Nothing goes to waste on a big railroad, and every scrap of iron and much secondhand material is valued at a fixed price and carried on the books as so much stock on hand. The system followed by the storekeeper's department of one railroad is a sample of many. The secondhand metals are gathered and placed in piles, regularly assorted.

Then they are classified by the foreman and taken into stock by the storekeeper or assistant. There are regular schedules—one of material which can be used again, which is denominated secondhand, and another of material which has to be melted before it can be used, which is known as scrap.

The classes are arranged something after the following order: Steel scrap, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, at prices ranging from $28 a ton down; wrought iron, Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4; cast iron, Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4. Even borings are taken into account, brass borings being credited at eight cents per pound and brass scrap and copper at twelve.

This material is shipped to division headquarters when a carload has accumulated. Here it is disposed of by the storekeeper on order of his chief, being shipped in carloads to big dealers in old metals in large cities. Much of it goes to Pittsburg, Cincinnati and such points. Orders for as high as 500,000 pounds of one kind of material are occasionally received from single firms. Most of the secondhand material is used over again in the shops, but it is previously taken on the books at a fixed price by the storekeeper and is charged up to the account of the articles for which it is used. All usable No. 1 wrought iron is received and charged up at 1¼ cents a pound, and cast iron at one cent.—Philadelphia Call.

Cannibalism In Saghalien.

The Vladivostock, a newspaper published in eastern Siberia, reveals a terrible state of affairs among the convicts on the island of Saghalien. It would appear that the convicts there have been treated by some of the subordinate prison authorities so harshly that the governor of the island has been obliged to interfere for their protection.

A warder named Khanoff and some of his assistants, who at one time were convicts themselves and had been raised to the rank of jailers, have been removed from their posts. Khanoff's treatment of the prisoners was so abominable that a number of them crippled themselves, cutting off fingers and toes, in order to be treated as invalids and to be freed from his terrible cruelties. Others fled to the impenetrable forest, where they suffered all the horrors of hunger.

In a satchel belonging to a fugitive convict who had been hunted down were found some pieces of human flesh. Investigation revealed that this man had been one of a party of four, and that only one of them now remained. The others had been killed and devoured by their comrades. Similar cases of cannibalism are, according to the Siberian journal, not infrequent.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

MONDAY, April 2, 1894.

Estate of Wm. A. Greenly, deceased—Filed proof of death. Filed order appointing administrator.

THURSDAY, April 5, 1894.

Estate of John Wallace, deceased—Filed final account and petition for distribution.

FRIDAY, April 6, 1894.

Estate of G. W De La Matyr, deceased—Filed petition for order setting aside personal property for use of family.

Bar silver, 59½.

The political bee is assuming lively proportions.

Mrs. J. B. Steward of Big Pine was in town yesterday.

Clark Young passed through town yesterday on his way south.

Charley Meroney came up from Keeler yesterday, returning to-day.

W. H. Walker, the sage of Olancha, spent the week at Independence.

W. K. Miller and others have a telephone line nearly completed to Redrock.

Mrs. N. E. Conklin is visiting with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. I. P. Yaney, at Bishop.

T. C. Boland has returned from his visit to San Francisco. His health is greatly improved.

Neil McLain has completed his ditch camp at Georges Creek and will break ground next week.

Mrs. M. Lewis has been awarded the Hospital contract and I. J. Woodin M. D. appointed County Physician.

Irv. H. Mulholland has been appointed Register of the U. S. Land Office at Independence, vice C. W. Craig—resigned.

The signal service station at Keeler has been dismantled, all instruments and documents being forwarded to Washington.

S. G. Sneden Esq. came down from Bishop on Wednesday on business in the Superior Court. He expects to return tomorrow.

E. Robinson shipped his cattle from Mojave last Monday. They were said to be the finest lot of beef ever shipped from there.

Several petitions for new roads in the vicinity of Big Pine have been granted by the Board. Full particulars will be given next week.

F. Batchelder of Oakland arrived at Independence yesterday. He expects to remain in the Valley some time looking for a suitable place to locate.

Hon. A. J. Gould came in from Darwin early in the week. He has been in very poor health for a long time and is here for medical treatment.

H. M. Yerington, Superintendent of the Carson and Colorado Railroad, arrived at Independence with a party of friends. They returned the same day.

Frank Williams, formerly of Bishop, arrived from Los Angeles Wednesday. He says the lack of rain in Southern California will cause great loss to farmers there.

Jewett Adams has been appointed Superintendent of the mint at Carson and Hirsh Harris refiner. Both men are strong silver partizans and the appointments give excellent satisfaction.

Several strangers, mostly Eastern men, went north on Thursday's train looking for land in Owens Valley. There will be many people coming to the Valley during the coming summer for that purpose.

The Georges Creek school, S. W. Austin, teacher, closed last Friday with appropriate exercises. Mr. Austin has given excellent satisfaction and the pupils have made good advancement under his tuition.

The lower road at Camp Independence has been drained and graded and is now in good condition for travel. Supervisor Uhlmeyer has constantly endeavored to keep the roads in his district in as good condition as the funds would allow.

CAUTION.

My wife, Maud B. Day, having left my bed and board without any cause whatever, and against my consent, I will not be responsible for any debts she may contract from and after this date.

A Desert Tragedy.

A correspondent writing from Mojave says: "A man named Thomas Keefe just came in and reports finding the body of Cramer close to Indian Wells, about six miles from Granite Wells. This Mr. Cramer started from here about the 18th or 19th of March for Slate Range with a four horse team loaded with a gasoline engine and provisions. Indian Tom from Panamint, with three young bucks, left Daggett with quite a number of unloaded jacks a few days prior to this man's death, and they were seen going away from Indian Wells with their jacks well loaded. The supposition is that they killed the man. A man named Wilson came up a short time after the killing, saw the dead man and buried him. He then took the man's two mules and went on his way, leaving the wagon and two horses. Mr. Keefe, who is an old mountaineer, came in from there to-day to make this report. We have telegraphed the Associated Press and the Sheriff of San Bernardino. We know Panamint Tom to be a bad Indian, still he may not have committed this crime. Had this Mr. Wilson not been so scared he might have made an examination and obtained some clue to the guilty parties."

To The Public.

Inyo's representative at the Midwinter Fair, Mr. G. P. Rixford, has informed the Executive Committee that the space is now ready for the reception of exhibits. Parties having anything to exhibit will kindly leave the same with the representative in their vicinity for shipment. Bring on all you have. Small exhibits from all will make up a large general display. The following are authorized to receive exhibits: John Bourland, Bishop; R. W. Thomas, Big Pine; A. W. Eibeshutz, Independence; E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine.

P. H. MACK, Chairman.

Directors' Meeting.

A meeting of the Board of Directors of Agricultural District No. 18 was held at Indepence last Monday evening. T. F. A. Connelly was elected President to serve for the ensuing year. It was ordered that the next fair be held at Independence. It was decided that the Fair Directors would have nothing to do with races unless the town would raise an amount which in their estimation would justify it. All holders of outstanding warrants are requested to present the same for payment. The usual committees were appointed for the ensuing year and the Board adjourned.

CHAPTER I.

The colonel, putting the money away and giving a receipt, called John Carlisle.

In a very quiet village in the hills of New Jersey Dr. William Curtis, of New York, has made a summer home for himself and his family, which is increasing in a way unhappily out of fashion now, when a man with two or three children thinks he has a quiver full and is content with that number instead of the baker's dozen of youngsters which as a rule in the olden time came to make the homes glad and left no room at the firesides for pampered poodles and snarling pugs. I found the doctor sitting on his lawn the other day, and as his children played about him in the grass he sucked contentedly upon an old German pipe and looked very little like the precise Dr. Curtis whose brougham is to be seen all winter long hurrying through Fifth and Madison avenues in the neighborhood known as Murray Hill.

When I have met Dr. Curtis in New York, on the streets or at the club his manner has always seemed to me very formal and cold, and I was most agreeably surprised at his genial cordiality when I found him in the country. He was bred in the country, and I am satisfied now that his formality in town and seeming coldness are but the manner of a very busy man, who is more or less preoccupied with the affairs which crowd his time. All this is thrown off in the country, and in manner he is as different as in appearance. The countryman, suppressed in town, reasserts himself with country surroundings, and there is not a simpler hospitality to be found at any farmhouse in the neighborhood than is dispensed by the busy and prosperous city physician in his village cottage.

"I am glad to hear that you have come to Nearbye to live. Come in," was the doctor's greeting, as he rose from his easy chair and took off his broad brimmed straw hat. Shortly after I had taken my seat I heard the very musical bell of a clock strike five times, and the exceptional clearness and mellowness of the tone moved me to remark it.

"Ah, you must see that clock," said the doctor with evident pride, "it has just been set up here. It is a Rittenhouse, and there is a most interesting story connected with it."

The old clock was in one corner of the dining room, the low ceiling of which barely gave room for the handsome mahogany case in which was housed the skillfully constructed handiwork of the great clockmaker of Philadelphia. The date on the dial was 1751, and this clock must therefore have been one of the earliest made by that master of the craft. This was certainly a splendid specimen of cabinet work, too, and the rich colors glistened with mellow luster, and the brass trimmings and eagle clawfeet shone in brilliant harmony. The full, round face at the top indicated the harvest moon, which was then making the summer evenings glorious with a flood of silver light.

That clock was made for my great-grandfather—said Dr. Curtis—and for one hundred and thirty-nine years it has been in the family doing continuous service. It was first set up in my great-grandfather's house in Germantown, near Philadelphia, and there it staid till his death, when his eldest son, my grandfather, took it to his place in northern New York. There it staid till I brought it here a few weeks ago.

The two most interesting events of its history happened—he continued—about sixty years ago, and then again while my wife and myself were spending our honeymoon at my grandfather's place about ten years since. My grandfather had a large estate, and besides being engaged in converting his vast forests into lumber he had a general store, in which was kept a very miscellaneous stock, suitable for the needs of the primitive people who dwelt thereabouts. To them he sold his goods, but much of the trade was in barter. Sugar and coffee he exchanged for furs and skins, and so on. He was also something of a banker, and in the old counting room, which occupied the back part of the store, from which it was separated by a partition, the most notable objects were this old clock and a strong box made of heavy oak and strongly bound with iron straps. This box was neither fire nor burglar proof, but it answered the purpose in the absence of anything better, and in it were kept money and valuable papers.

In 1830—continued Dr. Curtis—my grandfather had in his employ a young Scotchman, John Carlisle, who had been in America three or four years, and during all of that time in the service of Col. Curtis. Carlisle was a man of good education, having studied in the University of Edinburgh, but he was entirely without fortune. He had come to America to make his way and was studying law while earning his living as clerk and bookkeeper for my grandfather. He lived in the family of his employer and was treated with much kindness and consideration. He was a particular favorite with my grandmother, who considered him a model of sturdy manhood. His ambition at that time was to save enough money to enable him to go to one of the law schools and qualify himself for the practice of the law. In this he had her warm sympathy and she did all that she could to make his work pleasant. Late one afternoon in midwinter, when darkness settles down long before supper time, a man called on the colonel and paid to him $2,000 in gold. The money was in a canvas bag, originally made for holding shot, and the colonel, after putting the money away and giving a receipt for it, called John Carlisle and instructed him to make the proper entry in the books. He then closed up the strong box, put on his fur coat and went home, leaving Carlisle to close the store before supper.

CHAPTER II.

A day or two after this the colonel was to take a trip in a sleigh to Albany, the business center of that section, and he meant to take several thousand dollars to deposit in the bank. At the breakfast by candle light the colonel directed Carlisle to get out of the strong box the bags containing the gold he was to carry to Albany, and among the sums indicated was that in the bag he had recently received. Carlisle did not return to the house at once, as he was expected to do, and the colonel went over to the store to see what detained him. He found Carlisle on his knees before the strong box with the books and papers all removed from it, and nervously searching for something. His face was pale, and his hands trembled.

"What's the matter, John?" the colonel asked.

"What's the matter, John?" the colonel asked.

"I—I—can't find the $2,000 you got from Joshua Jones," stammered Carlisle in a scared way.

"What, what's that?" exclaimed the colonel loudly.

"I've looked everywhere," said Carlisle faintly.

"You need not look everywhere, young man, for I put it just here," said the colonel sternly, as he indicated a certain compartment with his finger.

"These," said John Carlisle, spreading his hands and pointing to the books, papers and bags of coin on the floor in front of the strong box, "are all that I found in the box when I opened it this morning, and Joshua Jones' bag is not here."

"Let's see, let's see," said the colonel; "get the cash book."

The two men went to work at the books, verifying the entries and additions. It only took half an hour to satisfy the colonel that everything was all right, with the exception of the Joshua Jones bag, which contained $2,000.

"This looks bad, John," the colonel said.

"My God, yes!" said Carlisle desperately; "it looks bad; damnably bad for me. Col. Curtis, could you not have placed the bag somewhere else?"

"Oh, no; I placed it there; there can be no doubt of that."

There was a little pause and the colonel said:

"John, I shall not go to Albany this morning. I shall go and have the horses put away. While I am gone you make another search and see if you can't find that money."

The colonel left the store. He announced to his wife that his visit to Albany was postponed for a little while, and he sat down before the generous log fire in the dining room and smoked three pipes of tobacco before returning to the store. He has told me that he could not bring himself to believe that Carlisle had stolen the money, but he could see no other way out of it. He staid away from the store a long time, so that if Carlisle had taken the money he would have a chance to replace it. He had a genuine liking for the young Scotchman, and it hurt him dreadfully to think that the young fellow was dishonest. At length he went back to the store, in which were now the other clerks behind the long counter and several countrymen about the big Dutch stove. He walked through the store into the counting room. John Carlisle, pale as a ghost, knelt before the strong box still searching in the empty compartments for the unlucky bag of gold.

"I can't find it, sir," said he, as he rose from his knees and faced his employer.

"That is unfortunate," my grandfather replied with curt severity.

"It is evident, sir," said Carlisle, straightening himself to his full six feet and for the first time looking unexcited and calm, "that you suspect me of having robbed you."

"Have your legal studies, sir, taught you that it is a wise thing for a man to be his own accuser?" asked Col. Curtis.

"I do not accuse myself, sir," said Carlisle with dignity; "the circumstances do that, and your manner betrays your suspicion."

"There is no use for us to quibble over anything at this time. I have trusted you implicitly. This money was paid to me, and I placed it in the strong box. You and I are the only persons who have access to the box. The box has not been broken open and the money is gone. These are the facts."

"And they tell against me most damnably, sir; I grant all that. But, sir, I feel that it is due to myself and to the confidence that you have always placed in me to say that I have not taken the money. For the past two hours I have been trying to live over in my mind the whole of the interval between Josh Jones' visit and now, and I think I can recall every little circumstance, but I cannot recall ever to have seen the bag at all."

"Possibly Jones did not pay me the money?" said the colonel, with stern sarcasm.

"I intimate nothing of that kind, sir: all I know is that I never stole your money, and I don't believe I ever saw the bag that held it."

"These nice questions had better be discussed by less interested persons than you and I," said the colonel sternly.

"Very good, sir," responded Carlisle.

My grandfather—continued Dr. Curtis, when he had filled and lighted his German pipe—returned to his house in much trouble. He wished to consult his wife about the missing money. He found her in the sitting room, waiting to hear why the visit to Albany had been postponed. He told her about it, and she, too, saw that he suspected that John Carlisle had stolen the money.

"William," she said very gravely, "I don't for an instant believe that John Carlisle took that money!"

"I certainly don't like to believe it myself, but I can't help it. How can I get around believing it? Why don't you believe it?"

"I don't know why, but I feel that he did not do it; I am sure that he could not do it; I know he did not do it."

"How do you know it?"

"Because he said he did not, and then no man with an eye like his could be a thief."

"Well, Maria," said the colonel, "your intuitions are usually pretty accurate, and have great weight with me; what shall I do? I can't keep John around here with such a suspicion hanging over him."

"I don't know, I am sure; I shall go and talk to John about it."

And my grandmother, who was a young woman then, threw a shawl over her head and shoulders, and went over to the store. She staid in the counting room for two hours with Carlisle, and they came out together and went to the house. John Carlisle went to his room, and she joined her husband in the sitting room.

"Well?" asked the colonel.

"John did not take that money, William."

"How do you know?"

"He has told me so."

"Oh!"

"William, your suspicions do a good man a great wrong. I am perfectly sure that he is as innocent as a babe unborn."

"Well, Maria, it may be as you say, but I don't see how I can feel the same toward John and have him about here when I have not the same faith in the inexplicable as you have."

"No, I would not have him stay here either, it would not be just to him; but he does not like to go away with such a suspicion hanging over him. I have come to ask you to ratify a proposition I have made to John for him to go to Albany and finish his law course as best he can. He will only go, however, on condition that he shall be upon parole and report regularly so that he may learn if the money ever be found, or be in reach if you should ever wish to prosecute him."

"So you wish to make such an arrangement?" asked the colonel, with a suspicion of sarcasm in his tone.

"Don't you think well of it?"

"I don't know that it is not my duty to have that young man arrested at once and prosecuted," said the colonel, "but I shall do as you suggest, for, Maria, I never knew your intuition to be at fault, just as I never knew you to be able to give the reason for the faith that is in you," and the colonel smiled on his comely young wife, and seemed glad to dismiss from his mind all responsibility for the disagreeable incidents of the morning.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

High prices are sometimes paid by Australian sheep growers for thoroughbred rams. A breeder named Russell once gave $5,000 for an animal bred in Victoria. This is because Australian bred sheep, when inbred for three or four generations, lose their wool and become hairy. A somewhat similar change is observed in rabbits. To check this tendency sheep herders import thoroughbred rams and pay almost any price.—London Truth.

ITALIAN BRIGANDS.

Their Relations With the People Are of a Most Friendly Character.

Ansuini, Tiburzi and Fioravanti are the names of the brigands actually in the exercise of their calling. The last remains of a famous race, their names enjoy in Latium and on the confines of Tuscany a certain renown and an undeniable popularity. A few years back they had a numerous band of associates. Death and the galley have by degrees reduced their number. Domenico Tiburzi, the most formidable of the three, was a cowherd at Cellere.

In 1872, at 25 years of age, he had his first differences with the law—a highway robbery, an extortion and a murder. Taken and condemned to penal servitude for life, in January, 1874, he escaped from the salt mines of Corneto Tarquina. From then until now he has remained at large, eluding all efforts to capture him. The forest was and is now his refuge, his kingdom. There, between Civita Vecchia and Grosseto, in the wide solitudes of the macchia, he has lived for 20 years, defying the spies and the rewards offered by the public authorities.

Tiburzi, strong in his refuge and in his terrible fame, which he takes good care every now and then to renew, lives—permit the expression—as a man of honor. He does not rob; he does not steal; he does not harm any one. He levies taxes after his own fashion. The wealthy of the neighboring districts pay him every month a fixed contribution—money, wine, bread, weapons and tobacco. In recompense he guarantees the safety both of their lives and of their property. In short, he acts as a kind of public guardian for them in the macchia.

The relations between the brigand and the people are of a most friendly description. The poor, when destitute of food, come to Tiburzi. He also gives them coin, with which he is always well provided. Do not imagine that such amicable relations exist only with the poor and uneducated country people.

It is the rich land owners who pay most willingly the tax which brings them an entire security for their rural property. But woe to the spy! Sooner or later, be it from afar or near, the terrible hand of the brigand strikes him, and an atrocious vengeance rouses the authorities and convinces the unbelievers of the existence of the legendary brigand. In this way Tiburzi lives. Seventeen different warrants hang over him, but excepting the first crimes, the others are all for acts of vengeance against supposed or dreaded spies.—Chambers' Journal.

A Boom In Whitewash.

A missionary stationed at one of the South Sea islands determined to give his residence a coat of whitewash. To obtain this, in the absence of lime, coral was reduced to powder by burning. The natives watched the process of burning with interest, believing that the coral was being cooked for them to eat. Next morning they beheld the missionary's cottage glittering in the rising sun white as snow. They danced, they sang, they screamed with joy. The whole island was in confusion. Whitewash became the rage. Happy was the coquette who could enhance her charms by a daub of the white brush. Contentions arose. One party urged their superior rank; another obtained possession of the brush, and valiantly held it against all comers; a third tried to upset the tub to obtain some of the cosmetic. To quiet the hubbub more whitewash was made, and in a week not a hut, a domestic utensil, a war club or a garment but was as white as snow; not an inhabitant but had his skin painted with grotesque figures; not a pig that was not whitened, and mothers might be seen in every direction capering joyously and yelling with delight in the contemplation of the superior beauty of their whitewashed babes.—Missionary Chronicle.

Marine Engines For Land Service.

An interesting departure in engineering is the introduction of marine engines for land service. One of the great electric illuminating companies, it appears, has adopted them in its work, and concerning their economy in respect to space and power it is reported that the land engine takes up some ten times as much space as a marine engine, and the marine quadruple expansion engine has ten times the heating surface of the land engine. Further, the new quadruplex two crank expansion engine is twice as powerful as the triple expansion three crank engine, occupies also 30 per cent less room and carries regularly 210 pounds of steam. The land engine carries only 80 or 90 pounds of steam and gets one horsepower out of from 4 to 10 pounds of anthracite coal, while the quadruple expansion marine engine develops one horsepower out of 1¼ pounds of Welsh coal—that is, according to these data, the land engine requires from two to four times as much coal as the marine engine to produce the same power.—Age of Steel.

Tennyson's Memory.

Tennyson, when a young man, had a strong liking for Gray, and classed him and Burns as the two greatest lyric poets of any age or country. He much loved some of Burns' poetry. But before all Tennyson placed his Bible. He had also a great liking for Dante's "Inferno," and knew it line for line. He would boast in his pleasant way that if any one read one line he could give the next from memory. And he invariably did it.

THE BEST TEACHER.

The Arabs say that the best Teacher is Time. That is true, especially when year after year enforces the same lesson. For more than thirty years ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS have been in use in every part of the world, and the testimony is universal as to their value as an external remedy for pains of every kind in the back, chest and side. Some people have learned the lesson so well that they try to imitate them, and the result is a host of counterfeits, all pretending to be just as good as ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, and unconscious that by this very statement they acknowledge that ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS hold the first place. AN UNSEEN ENEMY

Is more to be dreaded than an open and visible one. That subtile and lurking foe, which under the generic name of malaria manifests itself, when it clutches us in its tenacious grasp, in the various forms of chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague or ague cake, can only be effectually guarded against by fortifying the system against its insidious attacks with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a thorough antidote to the poison of miasma in the system, and a safeguard against it thoroughly to be relied upon. In the event of a malarious attack, avoid poisoning your system with quinine, and use instead this wholesome remedy, unobjectionable in taste and far more efficacious than any drug. Use the Bitters for dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, kidney complaints and rheumatism.

Long Siege of Dangerous Illness

Given Health and Strength by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"I have been through a terrible siege of illness, and owe my present health to Hood's Sarsaparilla. First, I was taken sick with measles, and on the eighth day the doctor said I had bronchitis following that complaint. In a short time lung fever developed, and I was in a serious condition for quite a while. When I began to get a little better, my friends thought that if I ever got up I would have Consumption. I had such a terrible cough and threw off twice my weight. After an attack of the grip I was very weak and did not gain health at all until I began to take Hood's Sarsaparilla. I had no appetite for anything, and was sick at my stomach continually. Before I had taken one bottle there was A Change for the Better. The second bottle did for me what no medicine had ever done. It gave me strength and brought my general health up to where it was two weeks before I was taken with the measles. I have now finished my third bottle, and feel strong and well. I shall always thank to Hood's Sarsaparilla." E. IRENA HARRIS, Irving, Oregon.

CLIP, SAVE AND SEND TO US

A completeset of our 12 advertisements, of which this is No. 1, The sets worth $25, and we will allow you that amount for it in the following way. If sent in all at one time by a regular subscriber to this paper immediately after the last one appears, together with the name and address of both subscriber and paper, and dates of papers from which they are clipped, WE WILL ALLOW YOU $25 TOWARD THE PURCHASE OF ONE OF OUR NEW, LARGE SIZE, ALL STEEL FEED CUTTERS WORTH $40. Only one Feed Cutter to any one person.

This makes the cash payment only $15 for this Feed Cutter, which will be found as superior to any now in use as the Aermotor was to anything in existence when it first appeared, and will drive from the field all competitors and take and hold the trade in Feed Cutters as the Aermotor, the Aermotor Steel Fixed and Steel Tilting Tower have in Windmills and Towers.

The talent which the Aermotor Company has shown in revising, recuitomizing, getting and holding the windmill business of the world, can be turned to many fields in the agricultural implement line and it proposes to show what it can do by taking up a number of articles, making them of steel and putting them in their final shape at a single stroke, as was done in the case of the Windmill and Steel Tower, and it proposes to furnish them at a greatly reduced price.

This Feed Cutter, for the present, will only be furnished on the above terms. THESE TERMS GIVE TO THIS SERIES OF 12 ADVERTISEMENTS A CASH VALUE OF $25. We shall offer other articles for which we will accept these advertisements or single copies of them, in part payment. One will be a Steel Hand Truck, in which we feel a special pride in showing our skill as revisers and improvers of staple articles. The cash requirement with this will be ridiculously small.

The third advertisement in this series will show a Steel Circular Saw and Frame, for farm and sawyers use. It is a PERFECT POLE SAW WITH PERFECT SAFETY GUARDS, and runs with very much less power than ordinary band saws and has a better saw. THIS $40 SAW AND FRAME WILL BE GIVEN FOR $15 AND FIVE COPIES CLIPPED AS ABOVE OF ADVERTISEMENT No. 2.

In localities where we can we are going to make liberal offers to accept copies of these advertisements in part payment for Windmills. If you have any thought of using a windmill this year write us at once, stating what you think you will need, whether Pumping or Geared, and if possible we will make you a liberal offer.

The past year, though one of unparalleled financial disturbance and business depression was one of great prosperity to the Aermotor Co. The fact that the Aermotor Co. in the past six years has Lowered the Cost of Wind Power to the Consumer to One-Sixth of its former Price has rebounded greatly to its benefit and has brought to its factory an enormous volume of business. Even at the very low prices at which we sell Steel Windmills and Steel Towers, made in the most perfect manner, of the most perfect material and GALVANIZED AFTER COMPLETION, THUS PERFECTLY PROTECTING EVERY PORTION OF THE METAL, it is possible to save a few cents on each outfit, and these few cents on the enormous number of outfits are wholly satisfactory to the Aermotor Co., which has always derived more pleasure from the service it has rendered a great number of people and from the pride it takes in doing well whatever it puts its hands to, than from the money it makes from its enterprise.

This year, because it buys its material more cheaply and expects an enormous increase in its ever growing business, it offers its patrons a vast increase in the quantity and quality of material employed in the construction of its Steel Towers. The accompanying diagram, 2 1-2 x 2 1-2 shows the smallest angle that will be used by it in the corner posts of Towers even for the 8-ft. wheel. For the 16-ft. we use 4 x 4. Thousands of tons of Angles for Towers, cold-rolled and very straight and perfect are now being delivered at our works. Others who have a few tons, and therefore a year's supply of 2 x 2 angle which they are using for 8-ft., 10-ft., and even for 12-ft. wheels, will read this paragraph with surprise and sorrow, since we have not previously given them any information concerning what we will use for '94.

The Aermotor Co. proposes to distribute $500 IN CASH IN PRIZES for the best essays written by the wife, son or daughter of a farmer or user of a windmill, answering the question, "WHY SHOULD I USE AN AERMOTOR?" For conditions of competition and amounts and numbers of prizes send for particulars to the Aermotor Co., Chicago, or to its branches, at San Francisco, Kansas City, Lincoln, Neb., Sioux City, Iowa, Minneapolis, Buffalo, or 60 Park Place, New York City. Aermotors, Pumping and Geared same price, all Steel, all Galvanized After Completion, delivered free on cars at Chicago and shipped to any one, anywhere, at the following prices:

8-ft. $25. 12-ft. $50. 16-ft. $125.

AN UNGRATEFUL LISTENER.

He Wore a Wig Himself, but He Wasn't Interested In Wigs.

A cheerful looking citizen who had a firm grip on a strap in a State street cable car the other morning leaned down to speak to a seated but restless passenger wedged in between two larger men.

"That's a pretty good wig you're wearing, mister," he said, in a confidential tone, "but anybody can see that it's a wig"——

"Sir!"

"I say it's a pretty good wig, as wigs go, and I'm a judge of wigs. I've tried at least a dozen of them"——

"Sir, when I need any of your"——

"Not on my own head, of course. I never had occasion to use anything of the kind. But my grandmother"——

"Confound your grandmother, sir!"

"That's what I always used to say. She was rather hard to get along with. Nobody could please her. She didn't seem to appreciate kindness. You'd never get any thanks from her. She took everything as a matter of course. When she was about 60 years old, she took a notion her hair was too thin and she must have a wig. I argued with her, but it didn't do any good. She must have her hair trimmed short, and I must get her a wig"——

"I'd like to know, sir, what difference all this makes"——

"What difference? Bless your soul, it made a difference to me of $265, first and last. I had to buy her ever so many wigs in trying to suit her, and when you've worn a wig awhile it's dead stock. Wigs ain't returnable, you know. Finally she took a notion she'd be more comfortable if the hair that grew on her head was cut clear off. To humor her, I lathered her head all over and shaved it as clean and slick as a billiard ball. She seemed to like the feeling of it, and I had to shave her head regularly once a week for a month or two and then twice a week. It only made the hair grow faster and thicker. I had to keep buying new wigs for her all the time, too, mind you. This went on for a year or two.

"One day I had a fall and broke my right arm. I couldn't shave her head for six weeks, and she wouldn't let anybody else do it. At the end of that time she had a crop of hair as thick and abundant as Paderewski's, only it wasn't as long, you know, and it stuck straight up as stiff as a prize fighter's. She couldn't wear any of her wigs. The bristles stuck up through them like a porcupine's quills. I only mention this to show what can be done with soap and a razor. If you would just throw that wig of yours into the back alley and get some friend with a good razor to"——

With a snort of rage the other passenger tore himself loose from his environment and rushed from the car.

"That's all the thanks a man gets for trying to do some fellow being a good turn," said the cheerful looking citizen, straightening himself up and grabbing another strap.—Chicago Tribune.

Ostracized.

Her despairing glance rested upon the limitless sea that compassed her about.

"Oh, cruel fate!" she moaned.

She drew her garments more closely about her and shivered.

"Alone, what have I to live for?"

Woe was in every accent of her voice.

"No more may I know human society."

Her glances rested, as has been stated, upon the limitless sea, but her thoughts were elsewhere.

In bitterness she was wondering what on earth possessed her to be vaccinated on the arm anyway.

Remarking to herself that it made her mad enough to eat shingle nails, she wended her way homeward.—Detroit News-Tribune.

LORE OF SKULLS.

Great Story Tellers to Those Who Can Interpret Them.

IN A MUSEUM OF HUMAN OSTEOLOGY

Ancient Customs of Deforming the Head.—A Chat With a Professor of Skull-ology.

It is not generally known that probably the most complete museum of human osteology is located in Rochester under charge of Professor Charles H. Ward, who has an international reputation as an authority on this question. "Skulls are great story tellers," said Professor Ward. "For instance, the original of this cast of the top of a skull overturned the theories of half of Europe, and probably its discovery was the most sensational thing in the realm of science of the decade. Before this piece of bone, which you can hold in your hand, was discovered, nothing had been found which tended to show that human life existed in the preglacial period, in the days of the cave bear and other anteglacial fossils. Not only does the place where it was found indicate all this, but the skull comes nearer to supplying the much laughed at 'missing link' than anything ever before discovered. There is no question whatever that it is a portion of a human skull, but the forehead is lower than that of any normally developed skull ever found, and the superciliary or superorbital arch is heavier than ever before seen on a human skull. This is one of the most marked points of distinction between the skulls of a gorilla and of a man.

"You can see what I mean from this picture," continued Professor Ward. "The arch is that of the eyebrow, just over the eye socket.

"One of the most interesting things in the ology of skulls is the fashion of deforming the head prevailing among the savage races of North and South America. It is accomplished by pressure brought to bear on the skull through infancy. The cliff dwellers flattened the back of the head. Skulls have been found on an island in the gulf of Mexico which were divided into two lobes, evidently produced by fastening a strap from the back of the neck to the forehead of the infant. If there had been more travel in those days, the fashion might have spread. The fad of flattening the front of the head evidently prevailed among the ancient inhabitants of Peru, as the mummy remains clearly indicate, and this has led to a belief that there is some race connection between the ancient Peruvians and the Flathead Indians of today.

"You can see the effect produced by the process I have described from this picture. Were this deformity produced on the head of a grown man, it would be followed by insanity and death, but the brains of the infant gradually accommodate themselves to the new conditions, I should judge, however, that it would be difficult to have a very highly developed intellect with a skull of that shape. Here, you see, is the skull of a Peruvian lady of high rank. We know that this was some Inca queen by the pomp with which she was buried. She paid the usual tribute to fashion, or her parents did, in having her skull flattened up to the latest style.

"Here," said Professor Ward, "is the skull of a maiden of 18 years, who, with a number of her companions, was knocked in the head with an ax and was eaten on an island in New Zealand several centuries ago at a great feast."

"For goodness' sake, how could you find out all that?"

"Simply enough. You can tell it all for yourself, with a little help. Of course we know from the place where it was found that it was in a land where cannibalism prevailed. Father found no less than seven skulls, all with a fracture like this horrid one, where the victim was struck with an ax or some similar implement. Then all have the hole knocked in at the base of the skull, evidently with the purpose of extracting the brain, for the human brain is considered a great delicacy by cannibal epicures. We know from the sharpness of the edges of the orbital cavity and other infallible indications that this is a woman's skull, for an expert can always tell a male from a female skull at a glance. Lastly, you can see by counting for yourself that the dentition of this girl's skull is not complete, and that therefore this is, as I have said, the skull of a New Zealand maiden of 17 or 18.

"I had a curious instance not long ago of the way in which an observer can find a story in a skull. A skeleton was sent me from a hospital in Vienna to be mounted. The skull had not been opened. The man had been taken ill on the street suddenly and had been taken to the hospital. In polishing the skull I found a fine black line which would not come out. I opened the skull and found that the line was a portion of the point of a blade which projected half an inch in the skull, and which had broken off so short that it would have been impossible to tell of what the man died unless the skull had been opened as I opened it. Here was a murder mystery which the law will never probe, for the wound was mortal."—Rochester Post-Express.

People Who Borrow Books.

Book borrowers are probably the greatest nuisance in the world, and there is no reason why they should exist at all in these days of cheap literature, of public free libraries and other establishments of a similar nature. Book borrowers are usually lazy people, who will not take the trouble to go and buy a book for themselves if they can get it from a friend for nothing.

I really do not see why a man should lend his books any more than he should his chairs or his dining room table. You might do without the second and third, but you could scarcely exist without the first.—London Graphic.

About Dusting and Sweeping.

"You would scarcely believe," said a lady to a caller who dropped in one morning, "but I haven't swept my parlors thoroughly in three months, at least what we would ordinarily call sweeping them, and I am sure you will agree that they don't look it. Of course I have points in my favor, as there are no children about the house except those of casual callers, but even then I should not be such a slave to a sweeping day as most of my friends are. To begin with, I never allow my rooms to get all littered up. To be sure, eternal vigilance is rather hard work, but all the the same I think it pays. I never see a scrap of any sort on the carpet without picking it up at the first opportunity. I take pains to keep things so far as possible in their places, and, between you and me, what I think is the strongest of all points, I have just as little in my rooms as I can get along with. For years my life was a burden with bric-a-brac and trinkets and ornaments and draperies and fancy articles of every description, which had to be put in order and dusted and looked after daily.

"Now I keep within easy reach a very large, soft square of flannel. This I wring very dry out of clean water, and once in awhile move an article of furniture and wipe the dust from the carpet under it with this cloth. I never bother myself to go over the whole room at one time, but just keep track of the places where dust is most likely to accumulate. My dusting is done with soft, rather large cloths. I wipe up the dust with the utmost care, working very slowly, and between every article I take the cloth to the open door or window and give it a thorough shaking. In this way I not only clear the dust off from the articles in the room, but keep it from the carpet and get it out of the room altogether. There is science in everything, even in dusting a room, and I contend, and with a fair array of facts to prove my statement, that if the parlor is properly cared for, one sweeping in a month will answer every purpose. Of course, sitting rooms and dining rooms need more care, but then once a week is plenty, if the dusting cloth and brush are used with discretion and thoroughness."—New York Ledger.

Gorgeous Gowns of Humble Origin.

Many are the stories we have read about how some of the world renowned dressmakers study color effects and arrangements from tropical birds and gorgeous sunsets, and how they travel here and there and search the history of all time and peoples for new models. All this we have read, and our admiration for the versatility of these dress artists has been great, and in our ignorance we have given them more merit than is really their due. "Do you know," said a buyer for one of the largest shops to me the other day, "that a great many of the costumes sold by Worth and other well known dressmakers for fabulous sums, and which have helped to establish their names as authority on dress all over the world, are very often designed by some obscure little woman living in a back street?

"These poor, hard working women have sometimes great talent as designers, and whenever a particularly brilliant idea strikes them they will spend their last franc to buy the materials necessary to make the dress, which, when finished, they will carry to the head of some one of the large establishments in the hopes of selling it. If the dress happens to please, suggestions are made about changes or improvements, and the designer is given an order which enables her to provide herself from the warehouse's storerooms with everything necessary to make the dress. When complete she again takes it to the head of the house, who pays her well for her work and she goes away happy.

"Thus are dresses which cost perhaps 300 francs sold for as many thousands, and the name of the seller gains an added renown, which is his only by right of purchase. In Paris today not a few of the rising dressmakers, by selling three or four gowns in this way, have made enough money to establish themselves in a business which their talents have enabled them to enlarge and make successful."—Philadelphia Press.

A Cure for Worn Out Faces.

No one knows the care of a house in all its departments as one who has tried it for years. No one can know the weariness of selecting, planning and knowing just what will be served (and better than any one else, too, just how it will be served) for the 1,095 meals which are needed to give one's family a year's growth, except one who has planned that number for several years.

Over and over again one hears: "She is worn out. She has kept house for fifteen years, and she is the best housekeeper I know."

All through the history of humanity a need calls forth a supply. Each condition of suffering or demand has through all ages brought forth its cure, its reply.

Sometimes we do not see the cure as quickly as we might, but it is always waiting, always ready when our need is great enough to drive us to it.

What, then, is the response here to the hundreds of drawn, tired faces; the hundreds of strained, tired voices; the hundreds of broken down women who, instead of ripening into a vigorous old age, wither and droop into different stages of incapacity and suffering?

The answer is here:

Learn bodily economy.

Spare your forces as you spare your money.

Watch your bank account of muscular and nervous strength.—Boston Herald.

Knew Her Own Mind.

A lady who was shopping visited the mantle department of a Woodward avenue store and the young woman attendant began to show her the different designs, exhibiting them on a lay figure.

"I think this would suit you," said the attendant, looking her over carefully.

"No," said the customer, regarding the long ends of the garment critically, "that is not my style."

"It will make you look slim," urged the girl.

"I have no desire to look slim," was the answer.

"But you will appear taller in it."

"And I do not wish to appear taller," said the lady quietly.

The girl looked at her a moment in surprise, then she said, with a little sigh:

"Happy woman! I wish more of my customers were as well satisfied with themselves. I always have to help them make up their minds as to what they want."

"I have a mind of my own," said the shopper tranquilly, as she selected the garment that suited her and brought her shopping and the social disquisition to an end together.—Detroit Free Press.

A TRAVELING DOG

Owney Goes all Over the Country, but has no Expenses to Pay.

PET OF THE RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE

The Clerks are His Friends, and He Travels With Them the Length and Breadth of the Land.

It must have been something of a wag who said that the tale of a dog "always goes." I feel bound to agree with the wag, especially when it comes to taking hold of the tale of such an interesting character as Owney, the railway mail service dog.

Owney is the greatest interstate traveler extant. He boasts neither of good looks nor of money, and still nine-tenths of his time is spent in mail cars on various railroads and takes up a journey across the continent with less preparation than you and I would make if we were going to breakfast. When he makes up his mind his wardrobe is made up, and he's off. That's all there is to it.

Owney has more friends than he can shake his tail at if he devoted a whole month for that purpose. In fact they are a sort of stock in trade with him.

There is nothing pretty about Owney, excepting his eyes, and his long association with mail pouches has even given those a leathery expression. As for his pedigree, there is a divergence of opinion. Some of his friends believe he is a Skye terrier, while others tenaciously hold to it that he is a Scotch terrier.

Some eight years ago a little pup strolled into the Albany postoffice unbidden and unkempt. At first there was a disposition to make the dog return to that unknown place from whence it came, but that feeling a person sometimes has for another in distress exerted itself in the brute's behalf and he was given food and lodgings and subsequently the name of Owney.

There was a tameness about the Albany postoffice that Owney could not stand. Things grew monotonous to him, and one day when a lot of mail pouches were loaded up for an outgoing train Owney perched himself on top of them, only getting off to get in the railway mail car. Since then Owney has been in about all the mail cars Uncle Sam makes use of, and those he has missed Owney probably expects to ride in yet.

There is no one who dictates to the dog as to where he shall go, or, in fact, whether he shall go at all. His dogness regulates all those little matters for himself. Having made up his mind to start on a trip, Owney boards the mail car (in fact, he will ride in no other) and throws himself languidly on the mail pouches, and the engine does the rest.

His moments of wakefulness are spent in roaming about the car, and at meal time he shares the luncheon of the railway mail clerks. There are no times when he winks for bread and is given leather, or barks for water and is given mucilage.

The clerks always take good care of their brute companion while he is with them, for there is no knowing when he will travel with them again nor at what station he will quit their company. If he is satisfied with the appearance of a town or city as he gazes upon it from the open car door he jumps off.

How long he will remain in the place is a matter Owney himself determines. His headquarters he makes at the postoffice, where he will lounge about for a day, or for perhaps two or three, when he again embarks and is off to pastures new.

He followed the mail pouches out of the postoffice one day and entered a western bound car. From one station and another came tidings of Owney's presence at these various points until word was passed along the line that the great traveler was on the Pacific slope, in the hospitable city of San Francisco.

Whether it was the up hill and down dale characteristics of the city that Owney disliked he only knows, but his visit was short, and in a few days he was on his way east by the southern route.

During this trip Owney encountered a new experience. He had always worn but a plain leather collar, on which was fastened a silver plate bearing the inscription, "Owney, Albany postoffice."

But during his travels eastward somebody presented Owney with a tan leather harness, and on this, one after another, in various cities, attached tags, medals and coins and other mementos.

When the dog arrived in this city there were between twenty and thirty official postoffice marks stamped on as many brass tags. Among the postoffices those recorded were those of San Antonio, Fort Worth, New Orleans, Atlanta, Nashville, Baltimore, Washington, Cincinnati and Philadelphia.

At each of these places had Owney paid visits to the postoffices. He had also visited several newspaper offices at various points, for tags were given him by each. There had evidently been a disposition by all whom Owney had encountered to present him with something or other, no matter how little its value, for there were lead half dollars and foreign coins that wouldn't pass anywhere else but on Owney's back in this country.

One of the funniest anecdotes told of Owney, which clearly shows the dog's wonderful familiarity with railroads and their connections, happened two years ago.

Owney was then in Albany and had made up his mind to make a trip over the Boston and Albany railroad. He boarded the mail car with his usual agility and was about settling down for a sleep when the clerks, who had discovered that Owney was being troubled with fleas, held a council of war.

The result was that it was decided to put the dog off, and at East Albany Owney was ejected. Thus for the first time, so far as history records, was Owney's dignity insulted.

He knew a better trick, however, than the clerks and lost no time in carrying it out. Owney boarded a local train for Troy, where he made a connection with a train on the Fitchburg road.

When the train arrived in Boston from which Owney had been summarily put off, the clerks were surprised to find Owney sitting on some mail pouches on the station platform. Owney had been in Boston an hour and a half.—New York Herald.

A Princess In Slavery.

"An African princess was owned before the war by a family in Scott county, Va.," said E. L. Dement. "She lived to a great age and never lost sight of the fact that she was of royal blood. She was the daughter of one of the most powerful kings in Africa and had wandered away with a retinue of servants when the party was captured by a slave trader. Her fine physique caused her to bring a high price, and she could only be trained to work by teaching the other slaves to do deference to her, which they readily did."—Chicago Tribune.

HIS OLD BROWN COAT.

Pathetic Story of the Garment That Was Good Enough For Another Year.

He was a humorous old gentleman and said many good things. But the reason why he lived so long is not generally known. He imparted the secret to me himself when he was 95. It was a winter's day. Many young fellows of that age would have been sitting by the fireside. Not so this brisk and frisky and hearty young fellow. He was walking in the January sun. He had on an old brown greatcoat, with a woolen muffler round his neck and Canadian mittens, which are quite the best things for winter wear, on his hands.

Seeing him afar off I knew him by the old brown coat which, by dint of long wear, had assumed something of its owner's shape. A shabby old coat, stained with age, discolored in patches, ragged at the cuffs. I told him this. I said that he had worn that coat as long as I remembered him at all. It was a coat, I said, that would never wear out. He laughed. "It will last me out," he said pleasantly. Then he laughed again and turned so as to face the sunshine.

"I will tell you all about this coat," he said. "It has kept me alive. Either I or the coat must prove the survivor. I am pretty old, as you know—one of the oldest men in the world—not so old as Sir Moses Montefiore when he died, which is encouraging, but old as men go. Well, sir, it seems only yesterday that I was 80—80 only yesterday," he sighed. "Time passes. Life is horribly short. Sixteen years ago I was 80. On that birthday I overheard my daughters talking. They are dear, affectionate children," he added, "but cheeseparing. They were talking about my old brown coat. It was old then, 16 years ago.

"'It's good enough for another year,' said one. 'Quite,' said the other. 'In the nature of things,' said one. 'Quite so,' said the other. 'It would be a needless expense,' said one. 'Quite needless,' said the other. That was 16 years ago, and the coat and I have come to an understanding—we are trying to outlive each other. At present I'll back myself. 'A needless expense,' Ho! ho! 'Quite in the nature of things.' Ha! ha!" So he walked away, chuckling. All that winter and the next he wore the old brown coat.

In the following summer I heard that the coat had contracted moth, was incurably affected by moth—senile moth—they called it. It was not replaced. When autumn came, the old man sat beside the fire. He had no greatcoat, and he did not ask for one. The last time I saw him he chuckled again. "I've outlasted even that old coat," he said, 'and now it would be needless expense—quite needless. Because in the nature of things"— He turned his face to the fire and lapsed into silence. Before the end of the year he was silent forever.—London Queen.

The Pallograph.

The name of "pallograph" has been given to a newly invented German apparatus founded on the principle of so hanging a weight that, in consequence of its inertia, it takes no part, in a given direction, in the tremblings and oscillations of the point to which it is suspended. In a series of experiments with this device, made on board a twin screw vessel of the German navy, it appears that the vertical vibrations always attained their maximum when the horizontal were at their smallest, and vice versa. This phenomenon was peculiar to twin screw vessels only and is explained by the difference in the number of the revolutions of the two engines and the reaction of the masses of the moving parts.

The horizontal direction was exactly the reverse, and the action of the masses of the heaviest moving parts of the engines—the connecting rods and cranks—neutralized each other because they were of equal size and acted in opposite directions. The older passenger steamers had much smaller dimensions, and the engines, as is well known, ran at much smaller speeds than those of today. The smaller the length of the ship, the greater the number per unit of time of its vibrations. With the increase of dimensions the period of the vibrations become steadily longer, while the necessarily greater engine power which was requisite compelled the increase of the number of revolutions.—New York Sun.

Human Beings With Tails.

There are at least two well authenticated instances on record of human beings provided with taillike elongations of the spinal column. One of these is reported in the Asiatic Transactions (Calcutta, June, 1869), and the other in the journal of the British Anthropological society. In the first instance the tailed human was a Moi boy of Cochin-China, the tail being about a foot in length, but without a bony connection with the terminus of the spine. The boy was supposed to be 12 years old at the time the report was published, but the noted oriental scholar who made the examination has since died, and the society has lost all track of the tailed Chinaman. The second instance mentioned was reported in the journal of the British Anthropological society for July, 1890, and concerns two tailed Papuans, male and female, who were brought to England in the spring of the year last mentioned above.—St. Louis Republic.

His Trademark.

A gentleman had one of his carriages so severely scratched while passing the summer at his country place that he was obliged to call on the local carriage painter, who did the work very well, but tripped over the family crest on the door panel.

He took it to be the little trademark of the man who had done the job before and read the motto thereon inscribed as the name of a foreigner—thought it was "some Dutchman," he afterward explained.

So he was only doing the right thing, according to his light, when he painted out the other fellow's and inserted his own cognomen. This story has at least the merit of being perfectly true.—New York Recorder.

Pennsylvania In the Ice Age.

In the ice age the thickness of the ice which covered northeastern Pennsylvania has been supposed have been great enough to rise 2,200 feet above the sea level. Until a short time ago, no signs of glacial action had been discovered at a loftier elevation than this, but John C. Bravner has explored Elk mountain, which is believed to be the highest point in northern Pennsylvania, and there he found scratches made by the ice at an altitude of about 2,700 feet. It is evident, therefore, that the ice sheet which overspread this region during the glacial epoch must have been thicker than geologists have hitherto thought.—New York Ledger.

USES OF POETRY.

Lord Coleridge, the Great English Lawyer, Tells Us What They are.

POETRY IS A FRIEND TO MEMORY.

Advances of Classic Verses When Memorized.—Comments on Some English Poets.

Speaking as an old lawyer, I may say that few things compare in usefulness with a retentive, accurate memory. It is in youth that this faculty is formed and trained, and one of the best methods of strengthening it is the habit of learning by heart passages we admire from authors, both in verse and prose. What we learn in youth we are apt to remember well. Mental impressions at that period of life do not easily fade, and although they are easily received they are indelibly retained, and if they are impressions of noble thoughts clothed in noble language we are laying up a store of intellectual pleasure at one end of life for enjoyment at the other. Many of us live to grow old. If we do, our minds, if not ourselves, grow lonely. The interests of the world fade away, and the fashion of the beauty of it vanisheth, and a time comes when we feel that

"Tis meet that we should pause awhile
Ere we put off this mortal coil,
And in the stillness of old age
Muse on our earthly pilgrimage.

At such time the recollection of great thoughts, of lovely images, of musical words, comes to us with a comfort, with an innocent pleasure which it is difficult to exaggerate. And what should you learn? Speaking generally, the safest rule to follow is to learn that which pleases you best. I assume that it is not bad. But as to what is best taste is very varied, and that which commends itself to one man perhaps repels another. My own taste you must take just for what it is worth. But leaving out for obvious reasons all Greek and Latin writers, before and above every one, including them, I should myself place Shakespeare, an inexhaustible storehouse of wisdom, instruction and exquisite diction, indispensable to any one who has anything to do with speaking or writing. Next Shakespeare I for one should put Milton. Have any of you not heard the magnificent eloquence of John Bright? He told me himself that he was built on Milton, and if you heard him—nay, even if you read him—you can see that he is steeped in the spirit of this great poet, and that, though he does not imitate Milton, he speaks after Milton. And next for use—yes, for daily use—read Wordsworth. Much of Wordsworth has passed into the language, the poet of nature and of lofty spiritual thought, whose verse makes bright things brighter and happy men happier, the man of whose song Matthew Arnold says that when he spoke

Our foreheads felt the wind and rain.
Our youth returned, for there was shed
On spirits that had long been dead,
Spirits dried up and closely furled,
The freshness of the early world.

There is one man in English literature—perhaps there are two—who wrote too little. Gray is one. Every word he wrote is precious. He has the perfection of diction and of melody. Every line contains a thought or a picture complete in itself, and you cannot change a word without marring its perfection. The other perhaps is Wolfe. Every one knows his lines on the "Burial of Sir John Moore," of which, in my judgment, no higher praise is possible than to say they are worthy of their subject. But he wrote also "Go, Forget Me," and "If I Had Known Thou Couldst Have Died," two poems now but little known, but of which, if it is too much to say they are as fine as the one on Sir John Moore, it is not too much to say that they are worthy of the poet who wrote it. The time would fail me if I were to speak at length of Shelley, of Keats, of Scott, of Ben Jonson, of Ford, of Massinger, of Dryden, Pope and Young, not to mention more recent authors. Coleridge I omit, of course. Tennyson I omit, because I know that any estimate which places him, as I should place him, in an order of men far below Shakespeare is at present the mark of a Philistine.

Browning I omit, because, though I have admired him since I was a boy at school, I have not been so fortunate as always to understand him. He once rebuked me in a way which I relate for the comfort of those small striving souls who watch his flights and try to follow his course in vain, till he disappears from them in clouds. He was so kind as to give me many of his volumes, and he knew I honestly read them. Soon after one had thus been given me he asked me how I liked it. I replied that what I could understand I heartily admired, and that parts of it, I thought, ought to be immortal, but that as to much of it I really could not tell whether I admired it or no, as I could not understand it. "Ah, well," he said, "if a reader of your caliber understands 10 per cent of what I write, I think he ought to be content."

Whether for present or future comfort I cannot too earnestly recommend your acquainting yourselves with good books. They are the best of companions. In sickness, in misfortune, in sorrow, in sleepless nights and days of pain, you will find your recollection of great and wholesome literature a constant solace and refreshment. And as a man is known by the company he keeps, still more truly is he known by the books he reads and the authors he loves. Read only the best books and never read bad ones. Good books will nerve you for the work—the serious and earnest work, which is the lot of all true and good men. For, to quote a great writer, Dr. Young, the author of the "Night Thoughts," not from that book, however, but from his "Satires," a book much less known:

This is the scene of combat, not of rest.
Man's is laborious happiness at best.
On this side death his labors never cease.
His joys are joys of conquest, not of peace.

—Lord Coleridge in Contemporary Review.

He Was "Not In It."

Rare humor is at times made manifest in the police courts of the city and country. Quite recently an Irishman in Jersey City was under examination upon a charge of assault and battery. When asked if he had anything to say in his defense, Patrick, with all the seriousness in the world, said, "Well, your honor, I saw but little of the fight, as I was under most of the time."—New York Herald.

Tea Taking the Place of Beer.

Tea, the beverage of the higher classes in Germany, though more consumed in the north, is rapidly winning favor also with the middle classes in the south. Everywhere the tea table is growing popular, and Germany will probably at no distant period become a large consumer of tea.—Philadelphia Press.

A Strong Woman.

Mrs. John Ledalla, who came recently from the Fatherland and joined her husband on his fertile little farm in the country near Ansonia, Conn., is a large, buxom woman, and in view of an episode in which she and a burly tramp were the actors a day or two ago her neighbors declare that she is the strongest woman in Connecticut. Mrs. Ledalla had barely become settled on the farm when an ugly, vicious tramp darkened her door about the middle of the day while her husband was at work in the distant field and insolently demanded food and money. Mrs. Ledalla, who was busy about her household chores, was not scared, but she stopped sweeping her kitchen long enough to tell him that he would get no money and he had better get out.

"Won't, hey?" retorted the road knight. "Well, we'll see about that."

Whereupon he strode quickly into the room and sprang upon the woman, who promptly threw away her broom and defended herself. They wrestled in side hold style, then with square hold, and finally the tramp, who was not doing so well as he had expected, attempted to seize his antagonist by the throat, but with a quick muscular movement she eluded his grasp, and then took hold of him in downright earnest. She fairly pinned his arms to his side with a steel-like grip, whirled him right about face, shot him across the floor in a trice, and flung him headlong out of doors. The man was as powerless as a child in her hands, and he dropped on his back in the back yard.

Mrs. Ledalla, without taking the precaution to shut the door against him, went into the kitchen, picked up her broom and resumed sweeping. The chap outside had had quite enough athletic exercise for one day, evidently. He picked himself off the ground in a lame way and fled across the fields to the shelter of the neighboring woods.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Lady Somerset on American Women.

"And now would you tell me a little bit about women in America?" asked a contributor of Lady Somerset the day she returned from her long visit to New York. "Ah!" said Lady Henry Somerset with a smile, "that could not be told in a 'little bit.' It is an immense subject. The position of women in the States is on the whole very much better than it is here. It was delightful to see the early morning trains coming into the cities filled with young women who were all going happily to their employments, whether as clerks, typewriters, journalists, etc. How much better was it than if they had all been clinging to their homes with nothing to do and possibly nothing to live upon! It is looked upon as a recognized duty that every woman should be able to earn her own living.

"American women may marry or they may not; but marriage is fortunately not regarded as a profession. I was also very favorably impressed with the conduct of women at meetings. They might argue vehemently and disagree with each other during the meeting, but when it was all over the disputants would leave the hall arm in arm, chatting with each other on terms of perfect amity. In England such discussions would involve a personal quarrel. American women understand public affairs, but Englishwomen have yet to be taught them—that is the difference."—London Queen.

Miss Edwards' Forte.

The late Miss Edwards was a member of the Biblical Archæological society, of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies and of the various oriental congresses which are from time to time held in various European capitals. She was also an active promoter of the objects advocated by the Egyptian Exploration fund, founded in 1883, of which she has been for some years the honorary secretary. During the winter of 1889-90 she delivered no fewer than 115 lectures on Egyptology in the United States and at the centenary celebration of Columbia college received the honorary degree of L. H. D., Professor Tyndall and the prevost of Queen's college, Oxford, being the only other British subjects selected for honors at the occasion. At the beginning of the present year Miss Edwards was accorded a pension on the civil list.—New York Evening Sun.

An Undesirable Partner at Dinner.

A woman writes to protest against being assigned to a gourmand at dinner. On him all the charm of wit and flow of spirit is wasted. He laughs, but in a perfunctory fashion. He experiences a toadlike joy at having a partner pretty and well dressed, but his immediate concern is as to the soup and what particular cuts he gets.

As he appears to listen his attention is shared by other people's plates, and in mental calculation as to his portion. His spirits rise and fall with the courses; if the champagne is not cold enough or the duck is too dry, he grows morose. Too much talking makes him nervous, lest some succulent tidbit tumble down unawares. She quotes one man who exclaimed: "Too much talking; can't tell what we're eating. I've just swallowed two pieces of green fat without knowing it."—Exchange.

Women Not Contented "At Home."

"At home" days are beginning to get out of fashion in London, and the women who held them with irritating regularity once a week are now reducing them to once a month, and a few of those who found them most irksome have, with admirable cuteness, fixed them on "fifth Mondays, Tuesdays," etc., to limit them to one day in two or three months. One lady, who had become particularly annoyed at missing all the best things of the winter, which she declares came always on "her day," for the sake of seeing a lot of people she did not want to see and receiving a shower of pasteboard from the friends she did not want to see, says that next year she is going to observe as her "at home" day "the second Sunday in the week."—London Letter.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1894.

People vs. Henry Topp—Filed information.

Bar silver, 62½.

Sheriff Gorman again has tenants for his lodging house.

John Collins came down from Big Pine yesterday.

E. Robinson is expected back from Los Angeles to-day.

Henry Levy is expected home from San Francisco on Monday.

Mrs. F. Rhine left for San Francisco on last Saturday's train.

Regular meeting of Inyo Lodge No. 221 F. and A. M. to-morrow evening.

L. F. J. Wrinkle of Keeler spent a couple of days in town at the end of last week.

Mrs. A. Church returned to Hawthorne after a visit of nearly a year at Independence.

Supervisor Fitzgerald went to Big Pine last Saturday, returning Monday, to look after land and water interests he has there.

A. V. Davidson entered upon his new duties as Justice of the Peace yesterday, there being a sudden rush of Justice work.

Mr and Mrs. J. J. Gunn came in from the Minnietta last week and are residing at the Hannah place, recently purchased by Mr. Gunn.

Mrs. M. Moriarty came down from Carson last week and is visiting with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Malone, at Camp Independence.

Mrs. Hale of Alvord has gone to the Mid-winter Fair. Miss Etta Naylor has charge of Alvord Station during her absence.

Ed. Ober returned yesterday morning from a visit to Los Angeles and Santa Ana. It is quite likely that a match race will be made with Morris, the Santa Ana champion

Al. Stock, conductor on the Southern Division of the C. & C., was called to Sacramento last week by the sudden illness of his father, who was afflicted with a stroke of paralysis.

Sheriff Gorman is taking active measures to secure the fiend who is supplying the Indians with whisky at Laws. The extreme penalty of the law will be a mild punishment for the wretch.

A ball club was organized at Independence last evening with a membership of twenty. The boys propose to practice constantly and get up a good nine. They are now ready to accept a challenge from any nine in the county. Ben. H. Yandell is secretary.

Henry Topp was arrested Wednesday night on a charge of selling whisky to an Indian. Topp is a recent arrival from San Francisco and claims that he did not know it was a crime. He was doing a lively business, having already disposed of four bottles. He was examined before Justice Davidson this morning and held for trial in the Superior Court.

He Feels Very Sore.

The editor of the Index must have felt about 4½ cents worth when he wrote that article this week on the "reckless extravagance" of the Board of Supervisors. The fact is, that the present Board has effected a greater retrenchment in the finances of the County than any previous one. The Index knew that it was giving vent to a a piece of petty demagogery when it published that item. The bids complained of are for the County Hospital and Great Register and involves the small sum of $125, an amount saved in the single item of the reduction in the price of County printing, which he himself will admit was already at bedrock. Mrs. Lewis is thoroughly equipped for the Hospital and there is not a man in the County who will begrudge the suffering poor the additional care that the trifling higher cost will enable the contractor to give them. As to the Great Register it could not have been printed outside of Independence according to the contract and been sent to the various precincts in time for election. Of ten counties written to on the subject not one had their Register printed for less than 20 cents per name, the price fixed in this case. The Index is simply knocked out all around, and he feels pretty bad about it.

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

THURSDAY, April 5, 1894.
9 o'clock a. m.

Board of Supervisors of the County of Inyo, State of California, convened pursuant to adjournment.

Present Supervisors Freeman, Fitzgerald Uhlmeyer, Wilson and Chairman Love.

Proposal for boarding of County prisoners for ensuing term of one year, beginning May 10, 1894, and ending May 10, 1895, was submitted as follows:

Henry Levy, at rate of 80 cents per day for each prisoner. There being no other bids said proposal was ordered accepted.

Proposals for care of County indigent sick for same ensuing term of one year were opened and read as follows;

Fred Schabbell, at $840 per annum and for all excess over four patients at rate of 75 cents per day each.

Margaret Lewis, at $936 per annum and 85 cents per day for excess over four.

Said bid of Margaret Lewis was ordered accepted upon the filing of a bond to be approved by Chairman of the Board in double amount of contract price of $936.

Proposals for service of County Physician for same ensuing term were opened and read as follows:

Dr. J. D. Blair at rate of $500 per annum
Dr. L. L. Woodin at rate of 400 per annum
D. I. J. Woodin at rate of 350 per annum

Petitions of citizens in favor of appointment of J. D. Blair and L. L. Woodin were read.

Vote for appointment was taken as follows:

For I. J. Woodin, Supervisors Freeman, Uhlmeyer and Wilson.
For L. L. Woodin, Supervisor Fitzgerald
For J. D. Blair, Supervisor Love.

Upon motion of Love seconded by Wilson, the appointment of I. J. Woodin as County Physician was made unanimous and the Clerk directed to issue certificate thereof upon filing of a good and sufficient bond in double the amount of said $350.

Proposals for printing 400 copies of Inyo County Great Register for 1894 were opened and read as follows:

W. A. Chalfant at 17 cents per name.
I. H. Mulholland at 20 cents per name.

Upon vote being polled I. H. Mulholland was awarded the contract by the following:

For Mulholland, Supervisors Fitzgerald, Uhlmeyer, and Wilson
For W. A. Chalfant, Supervisors Freeman and Love.

On motion of Freeman, seconded by Wilson, said contract to Mulholland was made unanimous.

Board adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock a. m. Friday, April 6, 1894.

Another Lothario.

Independence has been treated to a number of sensations lately. Close upon the heels of the Jenkins affair comes another a little worse. About a month ago a man and woman camped on the creek south of town and have since remained there, apparently as happy as turtle doves. On Wednesday a second man arrived who proves to be the brother of the first man and husband of the woman. A fracas immediately ensued, No. 1 going down the street bareheaded for all he was worth and the woman hiding in the sagebrush, leaving No. 2 in possession. No. 1 spent the night in the jail and the woman went back to her husband with whom she is again ready to take up the battle of life. Next day a compromise was made whereby No. 2 gets his wife back, together with the team, tent and camp fixtures, while No. 1 again starts out to face the cold world alone. The parties, whose names are De Closs, came here from Arizona.

To The Public.

Inyo's representative at the Midwinter Fair, Mr. G. P. Rixford, has informed the Executive Committee that the space is now ready for the reception of exhibits. Parties having anything to exhibit will kindly leave the same with the representative in their vicinity for shipment. Bring on all you have. Small exhibits from all will make up a large general display. The following are authorized to receive exhibits: John Bourland, Bishop; R. W. Thomas, Big Pine; A. W. Eibeshutz, Independence; E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine.

The brown eyed blond young woman from the west had charmed a swell young man with her large and commodious fortune, and he was doing all in his power to win her.

She wasn't a fool by a great deal, and that made it 90 per cent more difficult for him and forced him to develop all his resources.

At last he struck upon a plan which he thought had the prize package in it.

"I have never told you," he said to her one evening, "that long before I ever saw you fate had directed me to you."

"Indeed?" she responded, so sincerely that his heart beat faster, and her face blushed at the compliment.

"Yes, and it came about in a remarkable way. Just for fun one day I consulted an astrologist, and she told me that I would never care for any woman until I had met one, who was then only a schoolgirl, a beautiful golden haired creature, with wonderful brown eyes, whose home was toward the setting sun. I laughed at the prophecy, but I found the words of the seer were true, for I never cared for any woman until I saw you."

Then he stopped, embarrassed and palpitating, thinking she would fall into his arms.

But she did not. On the contrary, she snickered.

"Are you sure your astrological friend spoke of a golden haired schoolgirl?" she asked.

"How could I ever forget?" he responded intensely.

"You couldn't, probably," she twittered. "Only when I was a schoolgirl I wasn't golden haired. I've only been using blondine for the last year, don't you know?" and then a heavy weight seemed to fall on him, and he staggered away.—Detroit Free Press.

CHAPTER III.

He could not and would not be a candidate.

The next morning after these exciting incidents my grandfather started for Albany, and did not get back for a week. When he returned he found that John Carlisle had gone away, leaving a letter reiterating his denial of any knowledge of the bag of money and recording a promise to keep Col. Curtis informed of his whereabouts. He also said that he would return whenever he should be needed. Year by year went by, and the disappearance of the two thousand dollars would have been forgotten but that John Carlisle regularly reported by letter on the first day of every January. He could never forget the shadow which in his youth fell across his path, nor was he willing to break his parole. When he left my grandfather's John Carlisle went to Albany and then to New York. He studied law and taught school, but the once genial young Scotchman was no longer genial. There was a sadness about him which however hard he tried to conceal was always apparent. He made friends, but he was never intimate with any one. This suspicion upon his integrity had changed him in many ways, but he never seemed to give up the hope that the money would be found, or its mysterious disappearance explained before the death of his old employer. Years and years passed by, and John Carlisle steadily rose in the regard of those with whom he came in contact. He had ability beyond that of the ordinary lawyer, and managed his own affairs with such skill and tact that as time went by he grew rich, and enjoyed the esteem of financial as well as legal circles. Before he left Scotland Carlisle had a sweetheart there, and it had been his constant hope during his first few years in America that he would be able to go back to his native heath and marry the lassie to whom as a boy he had pledged his heart. When his trouble was fresh upon him he felt that he must write and tell her about it, but he could not bring himself to do this. This was his sorest trouble—to be unable to speak plainly to her from whom he should have had no secrets. But he never mentioned any mystery until he was able to say to her that he would go back to Scotland and marry her if she still wished it.

He appeared—said Dr. Curtis—to have more difficulty in telling Mary Graham about his misadventure than about doing any other act in his life, and at last he sent this letter to my grandmother.

And Dr. Curtis, having sent his son to the house for a portfolio, produced this letter, which was most faded and bore upon its back this indorsement in old Mrs. Curtis' handwriting: "John Carlisle to me. Answered at once. Also a letter sent to Mary Graham, Aberdeen, Scotland."

This is the letter:

MADAM—When I came to America I was engaged to be married to Miss Mary Graham, —— terrace, Aberdeen, Scotland. The time has now arrived when I should go home to keep this engagement. I have never said anything to the young lady of the trouble I had while in your husband's employ. I have been unable to say anything to her about it. I have tried a thousand times, but I have always been unable.

My object in addressing you is to ask you to write to her and tell her what happened when I was a resident of your house. I wish her to hear the whole truth, or what there is of truth that is known, from some one else than me. I remember your kindness with the deepest gratitude, and if you care to add to the debt I owe you, you can write to Miss Graham. I shall not go to Scotland till she has heard from you.

I have the honor to be, madam, your obedient servant, JOHN CARLISLE.

I have never seen what letter my grandmother wrote to Mary Graham—continued the doctor—but it must have been satisfactory, for the next spring John Carlisle returned to New York and resumed his work, and he now had as a helpmate a bright checked young Scotchwoman who had been Mary Graham, of Aberdeen.

This act of my grandmother did not appear to relieve him of his responsibility, for year by year he continued to report to the colonel. He was peculiarly fitted for public life and had often been offered the nomination of his party for congress; but he had always declined. He did not know what might be said of him. At one time in a crisis in the affairs of his party his friends got together and concluded they could elect him to the United States senate. When he heard of the movement he invited these friends to his house and told them in the plainest terms that he could not and would not be a candidate or permit them to urge the matter further. This was a great blow to him for he had public spirit and he felt that he could do good service in that exalted sphere. But the shadow which had fallen across his young life would not permit him to take any public employment until it had been lifted.

CHAPTER IV.

When—said Dr. Curtis, continuing his tale—he had become a man of wealth, he said in one of his annual reports to my grandfather that he could easily replace the money which had so mysteriously disappeared, but that he would not do so as he had not taken it, and he had been the chief sufferer by the occurrence anyhow. Fifty years passed in this way. Col. Curtis and Mr. Carlisle never met, but after each letter from the lawyer the colonel begged in reply that he would say nothing more about it. During this time both of the men had grown to be old, and each had grandchildren, who had become men and women. I had been away from the old place a long time, and from the time when I went off to college till I got married ten years after I had only paid two or three very short visits to the sturdy old couple, who still lived in the home of their youth, and marveled that their children and grandchildren could find content in the great and busy cities of New York and Philadelphia. When I became engaged to be married I promised to spend my honeymoon with the old couple, and there I took my young wife, who is a daughter, you know, of Gen. Harford, of the army.

My grandfather, who was then 86 years old, fell completely in love with my wife, and made a great to do over her. His favorite seat was in the old counting room, which was no longer used as such, as the old gentleman had long since given up active business. The old clock ticked away in the same corner, and the iron bound oak strong box was in its accustomed place and was still used to hold valuable papers, but the money was now kept in the bank in the little city which had grown up a few miles away. We were married a few days after Christmas, and my wife's first visit to the old counting room was on New Year's day of 1880. There she found my grandfather just as his morning's mail and newspapers had reached him. He put them aside at once to receive her and place for her a comfortable seat before the huge blazing logs which burned and cracked in the good old fireplace.

The quaint and old fashioned furniture pleased her mightily, and my grandfather was delighted that she should be so easily pleased. He told her how long he had had this piece of furniture and that, but she was more interested in the strong box and in the clock than in anything else. He opened the box for her and explained how half a century before it was used for the storage of gold and silver. He also opened the door of the old clock, and she watched the dignified brass pendulum move to and fro. She took my grandfather's stick and in a whim poked down into the clock.

"Why, colonel," she said as she poked about the bottom of the clock case, "there is something in the bottom of the clock."

"Oh, I fancy not; put your hand in, William," speaking to me, "and see what Lois has found."

I did as I was bid, and pulled out an old canvas bag marked "J. J." in faded letters. As soon as the old gentleman saw the bag his face became pale and he would have fallen had I not helped him to his chair. He told me to put the bag on his table and to go for my grandmother. My grandmother bustled over to the counting room, much worried at the sudden summons. When we reached there we found that my wife had opened the bag and taken from it 200 ten dollar gold pieces. My grandfather said to his wife when she entered:

"Maria, there is the Joshua Jones bag of gold with the two thousand dollars in it. Lois found it in the bottom of the old clock. I remember now perfectly that when old Josh Jones paid it to me I put it myself in the bottom of the clock case and meant to take it out in the morning. Until this moment I forgot all about putting it there; now I remember it perfectly."

My grandmother's usually rosy cheeks were white now as she asked:

"Have you heard from John this year, father?"

"There is a letter from him this morning. I shall write and tell him that the money is found and beg his pardon."

"No, father," the old lady answered, "you should [illegible] him if you were able, but as you [illegible], you should invite him to co[illegible]

"I'll do [illegible] write at once," he said.

"No," the old lady answered; "telegraph. This injustice has lived long enough."

My grandfather did not hesitate to obey, and wrote at once a telegram as his wife requested. All this was very mysterious to my wife and me, but neither of us liked to ask for an explanation. We felt that if there was anything which we had any business to know we should be told all in good time. We went out of the counting room and left the old couple together. After some time we saw them coming to the house together, and my grandmother was evidently now the stronger of the two. At the midday dinner the colonel was nervous and ate nothing. He had given and taken many hard knocks in his life, and I felt sure that there was some very disturbing cause for his present suffering and I was also sure that the finding of the bag of gold was the cause. Before we arose from dinner a telegram was brought to the colonel. He read it and said to his wife as he folded up the paper, "John will be here to-morrow, Maria." She smiled back at him, and he began to brighten at once. He said to my wife and me:

AN ENGINEER'S STORY.

A TRUE AND INTERESTING NARRATIVE FROM CASPAR, CAL.

The Remarkable Experience of a Railroad Man.—How He Was Saved.

(From the San Francisco Chronicle.)

Away up on the California coast, 140 miles north of San Francisco, in the beautiful little seaside town of Caspar, lives a man upon whom a modern miracle has been wrought. The man is Charles L. Hubbard, well known all over the coast for his faithfulness and integrity. His word in a dozen towns along California's coast is as good as a bond, according to what leading citizens say. Mr. Hubbard has worked for the Mendocino Lumber Company for the last thirteen years. He is working for the company now as a locomotive engineer, and a more conscientious and industrious man in a more trying and exhaustive occupation could hardly be found.

Mr. Hubbard was found, after diligent questioning, in the cab of his locomotive. His hands and face were covered with engine grease and perspiration, betokening his hard labor, but his clear, blue eyes were those of a happy, honest man. The Chronicle man climbed into the cab and said: "Mr. Hubbard, I've come all the way from San Francisco to hear the story of your suffering and how you were cured."

"Well, I'm glad to see you," said Mr. Hubbard. "I've half been expecting to see some newspaper man from there about it, for my case has attracted widespread attention. I've had rheumatism—that's what my trouble has been—for years. I get it in this hot cab when the cold wind and fog from the ocean blow in here.

"But to begin at the beginning, I must tell you that I have been working here for this company for thirteen years. I have had rheumatism all the time, and I think I first contracted it at the Chickahominy swamp in the war of the rebellion. I suffered terribly with it, especially of late years. Why, some nights I went home all doubled over and hardly able to walk. I don't know how I kept at work but suppose it was because I had to. I suffered a great deal in my bed. Some nights I have waked up and found my arm outside of the covers. At such times I could not put it back in bed, but had to lift it with the other hand and get it under the clothes very slowly. Of course, I was trying everything. I spent money for all sorts of patent medicines, paid doctors here and in San Francisco for treatment and bought a lot of electric belts. I paid over $70 for electric belts, got the most powerful I could find, but they did no good. Well, sir, my wife's sister in St. John, New Brunswick, sent us a lot of papers from time to time, and nearly all of them had remarkable stories of cures by a medicine called Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Finally my wife got at me to try some of the pills. I got some, and there was such an improvement in me after taking two or three boxes that now I wouldn't think of trying to get along without them in the house. My wife, too, has had much nervous trouble, and she began to take the pills with wonderful effect. They proved the best thing in the world for me, and my wife thinks there is nothing like them for nervous trouble. Our faith in them is so great that we recommend them to every one. People laughed at me at first and I laughed myself but they turned out to be the thing, and I wouldn't take lots of money for the good they have done me. As for the neighbors, I have purchased $15 worth of the pills for them, and they are doing them good for all sorts of ailments. I can give the pills the strongest recommendation, as I tried everything before without any good effect, and these have done wonders for me."

Mrs. Hubbard, the wife of the engineer, was found in her pretty little home which is fairly embowered in flowers. She was most cordial, and corroborated all her husband had said.

The neighbors and fellow-workman of Mr. Hubbard were most warm in their praises of the engineer, and also confirmed the story of the improvement in his health.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, and all forms of weakness either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, (50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50), by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., or Brockville, Ontario.

Everything Adulterated.

In the following neat little fable some of the eccentricities of modern adulteration are delicately disclosed to the commonwealth of consumers by a contemporary German satirist:

There were once four flies, and as it happened they were hungry one morning. The first settled upon a sausage of singularly appetizing appearance and made a hearty meal, but he speedily died of intestinal inflammation, for the sausage was adulterated with aniline. The second fly breakfasted upon flour and forthwith succumbed to contraction of the stomach, owing to the inordinate quantity of alum with which the flour had been adulterated. The third fly was slacking his thirst with the contents of the milk jug, when violent cramps suddenly convulsed his frame and he soon gave up the ghost, a victim to chalk adulteration.

"Seeing this, the fourth fly, muttering to himself, "The sooner it's over the sooner to sleep," alighted upon a moistened sheet of paper exhibiting the counterfeit presentment of a death's head, and the inscription, "Fly poison." Fearlessly applying the tip of his proboscis to this device the fourth fly drank to his heart's content, growing more vigorous and cheerful at every mouthful, although expectant of his end. He did not die. On the contrary, he thrived and waxed fat. You see, even the fly paper was adulterated.

Nothing Strange.

"My wife went down town today in all the rain to buy something that she couldn't do without, and she parted with it almost as soon as she got home."

"Not at all. She bought a comb."—King's Jester.

Patsey and His Pup.

Patsey Regan lives in "Goattown" and is seven years of age.

He owns a pup—of the yaller and yeller variety. The yells, indeed, are more yaller than the pup. And that deviltry in Goattown which isn't directly traceable to Patsey is indirectly traceable to Patsey's pup.

The two walked proudly out the other morning on their customary constitutional. Patsey was in front and the pup behind. The event of the walk was the pup's pausing a moment or two to breakfast on the seat of little Dominick Mullany's trousers. But Patsey didn't see this little episode, and Dominick was too much scared to yell.

Now Dominick has a mamma who has a good deal of ginger in her character. She lay in wait for Patsey.

Having accomplished the constitutional at the end of half an hour Patsey and the pup started on the return. Dominick's mamma met them.

"Say, you Regan!" she cried, "does that dog belong to you?"

"Which 'en?" inquired Patsey, taken by surprise.

"I say, is that dog yourn?"

Patsey looked from the scrowling woman to the miserable pup, and cogitated a moment.

"What fer?" he asked at length.

"What fer? 'Cause he bit my Dominick—that's what fer! Who's he belonger?"

Patsey backed off carelessly. Then, with judicious weighing of words, he announced:

"Well, if he bit your Dominick, I don't know who he belongs ter. I never seed him afore."—New York Recorder.

AN UNSEEN ENEMY

Is more to be dreaded than an open and visible one. That subtle and lurking foe, which under the generic name of malaria manifests itself, when it clutches in its pernicious grasp, in the various forms of chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague or ague cake, can only be effectually guarded against by fortifying the system against its insidious attacks with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a thorough antidote to the poison of miasma in the system, and a safeguard against it thoroughly to be relied upon. In the event of a malarious attack, avoid poisoning your system with quinine, and use instead this wholesome remedy, unobjectionable in taste and far more efficacious than any drug. Use the Bitters for dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, kidney complaints and rheumatism.

Blood Poisoned

But Hood's Sarsaparilla Purified, and Restored Health.

"Three years ago a file penetrated one of my legs just above the knee. Failing to receive the necessary treatment, set in. I became so weak and my system so much run down that I could hardly turn in bed or help myself in any way. After seventeen months' confinement, my wife took me to Walla Walla, Wash. Here the surgeons amputated my leg half way between the knee and the hip. Following this my health improved slightly but shortly gatherings began to form on my body. Finally Hood's Sarsaparilla was recommended and I could see a change from the first. Gradually I have improved; I am growing stronger and the painful gatherings have disappeared and I am about cured of my ills. All the credit is due to Hood's Sarsaparilla and I feel that I cannot speak too highly of it." B. L. BURNETT, Starkey, Oregon.

Blood Poisoning

CHILDREN'S SAYINGS.

Little Mary has always been devoted to her Aunt May and prays for her each night long and fervently. One day, however, during a visit at her aunt's, the child did something wrong and had to be punished. When evening came and she knelt at her aunt's knee to say her prayers, it was evident that the sore spot was there still. "Bless papa and mamma," began the childish voice, and then there was an ominous silence, after which the prayer was concluded with no reference to Aunt May. "Now," remarked Miss Four-year-old, with flashing eyes, as she rose to her feet, "what do you think of that for a prayer?"

Howard T., who has lived all his short life in a city, was taken recently to visit at a "real farm." The child was in ecstasies. Every animal on the place was a delight to him, but his affections especially centered about a Jersey calf. "I would like to buy it," he said to the owner. "But what would you give in exchange?" he was asked. "My baby sister," replied the child, with the utmost gravity. "We have a new baby nearly every year at our house, and we've never had a calf!"

Henrietta (a 5-year-old)—George Washington discovered America. Her Cousin W.—No. It was somebody else. Henrietta—Well, Columbus was the father of his country. Her Cousin W.—No. It was put the other way. Henrietta (cheerfully)—But it doesn't make any difference about the people, so long as you know the facts.

The inborn pride of Chicagoans and their neighbors in their city and all that belongs to it, especially since the fair, is well illustrated by a remark made by a youngster in Evanston, Ills., the other day. His mother overheard him talking with his little sister and discussing great questions, as children do, with all the gravity of his elders. Finally the little girl asked, "Harry, where was the world made?" And Harry, with an air of superior wisdom, answered: "Why, don't you know, Dotty? In Chicago, of course."—New York Tribune.

Desperate.

With bloodless lips the villain glared at her.

"You are in my power!" he hissed.

In terror she looked from the window upon the shifting throng of humanity outside.

"So near and yet so far," she moaned helplessly.

"Yield!" he whispered, with a ferocious frown.

"Never!"

She was transformed. She shrank not. She raised her hands. Intuitively he divined her purpose and recoiled.

"Curse her!" he cried. "She dares after all."

Yes, she dared. She removed her teeth, after which it was no trouble to yell for the police.

He fled.—Detroit Tribune.

An Early Arrival.

AN EXCITING RACE

A Young English Tourist's Flight from a Pursuing Wildcat.

HIS ALMOST MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.

Skating for Dear Life.—A Persistent Animal Follows an Unarmed Man for Miles.

Mr. Caryl Clyde, the young son of a wealthy London merchant, has returned from a trip of adventure through the northern part of Ontario.

"In the northwestern part of Muskoka," said he, "I found a body of water that extended through the forest for many miles. The ice on it was very smooth and entirely free from snow. One evening I left the camp for a skate up this frozen stream. The moon was bright and full, the sky was clear, and it was bitter cold, but a few strokes over the smooth and hard surfaced ice soon set my blood to tingling, and then I was as warm as though snugly covered up and asleep in my bed at the hotel. As I skated deeper into the forest I would stop and listen, and the stillness was so profound that I could almost hear the blood coursing through my veins, and the beatings of my heart sounded to me like the marching of infantry. In my hand I carried a small stick, which I used as a sort of balance as my body swayed with each stroke I took. In thirty minutes I had gone over five miles, and I stopped to rest. Some birds fluttered over my head, and I heard the cry of a distant screech owl. Then came another cry, and one that almost made me cease breathing.

"It was a harsh, unearthly scream, and so close was it that it rang in my ears like the beating of a gong. With a sudden impulse I dashed forward. There was a rushing, scrambling sound behind and then a wicked snarl. I gave a frightened glance over my shoulder and saw an animal about the size of a Newfoundland dog, and it had eyes that gleamed like glowing coals. From descriptions I had heard and read I recognized it as a wildcat, but I did not stop to make any critical examination. My only thought was of escape, for more than the little stick I carried in my hand I had no weapon of defense. The stream itself wound in a sinuous fashion through the forest, but before it had been frozen it had evidently overflowed its banks, for the ice extended on all sides as far as I could see through the woods. The bed of the stream was clear of trees and brush, and down this sort of lane through the woods I dashed at my best speed. The wildcat gave an angry snarl of disappointed rage as it saw me glide away. Without as much as a pocketknife about me I knew that I would not be able to wage any sort of successful combat with the hungry brute behind me.

"Exert, as I did, my best speed, the cat gained on me easily. Then I tried dodging tactics, and with great success. As I glided away down the stream the animal stood glaring at me with amazement. But this was for an instant only. Realizing that its prey was fast getting beyond its reach it came after me like a shot from a gun. At every bound it took its sharp claws cut the ice, and I could tell by this how much greater was its speed than my own. When I thought that in about one more bound the animal would be upon me I gave a sharp turn to the left, and the cat went on, pawing, snarling, biting and scratching over the smooth ice. I started back at a slower rate of speed, so as to be able to regain control of my breathing. The cat was soon again in close pursuit, but with apparently renewed effort and snarling and spitting much the same as an angry housecat would do at a dog.

"Again I dodged with ease, and his catship slid up stream, while I went down as fast as I could. I could hardly help laughing at the discomfiture of the baffled wildcat as it would slide past me when I dodged, wholly unable to help itself, but the dodging business was pretty hot work, and I soon began to find myself getting winded. How long this odd chase was kept up I do not know, but it seemed to me a decade. I fancy I must have gone about two miles down the stream, but to gain this I must have skated about ten. By this time I was ready to drop from exhaustion, and had I done so I would have been an easy victim for the hungry animal, whose unsuccessful attempts to overtake me seemed only to stimulate it to greater effort.

"'Click! whiz!' one of my skates ran over a small twig, and I went sprawling. The cat was close behind me and went on over my prostrate form.

"I was on my feet again in an instant, but I had lost some valuable time. I began to feel weak. The veins stood out on my forehead and felt as though they would burst. I made another dodge successfully and started down stream again. The moon was directly in front of me and about half way in the heavens, and from it seemed to stream a silvery path that came down from the sky to the ice some distance in front of me and then to my feet. The perspiration oozed into my eyes, and this silvery ribbon of light was all I saw. I heard a confused sound behind me, and knew that the pursuing animal was gaining fast upon me, but I didn't care. 'What would it feel like when it was tearing my flesh?' flashed a thought through my heated brain.

"Then I heard a low murmur like running water. The silvery ribbon from the moon danced in wavelets before my eyes, and I gave a tremendous jump. I reached the other side in safety, but the cat was less fortunate. There was a splash and a plunge, and the water was dashed over the ice. I fell and my trousers were soaked. The cat went on down the stream, but under the ice. I soon comprehended the situation. An uprooted stump was in the center of the stream, and such speed was added to the current by its striking this obstacle that it did not become frozen. There was an open space of about five feet. I jumped without knowing why, and landed safely on the other side, but the animal went under. I thought it was a narrow escape. I got back to camp as soon as I could."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Ghosts Mounted on Ponies.

Lately Cupertino has been visited by some spooks, or ghosts, or specters, or something of that sort. At least, several reputable citizens so declare. On their first appearance your correspondent was in San Francisco, and, of course, when told of the apparition, not having convincing proof, remained silent, but on Saturday evening he saw with his own eyes the apparitions, and this is what he saw: Five figures dash by on horseback at a mad pace; two were females and three were males. One of the males, who evidently was the leader, was a giant in size and was mounted on an immense charger. He was dressed in martial array and was of commanding mien. His companions I did not notice so closely, but they were all mounted on Indian ponies, and, as near as I could tell, his male companions wore no uniforms. The females had their long hair flying wildly about their faces, but from what glimpses I did get I should say they were Indians or Mexicans. Several others saw them, and some say they gave unearthly yells or warwhoops whenever they saw any one. This is their second visit, and as yet no one is able to explain the mystery.

Joe Kelly, an old settler, who resides on Stevens creek, tells a legend about an American soldier who was lured to his death by a beautiful Indian maiden, the daughter of a chief of a tribe which once owned the country around Cupertino. Mr. Kelly claims that these apparitions were often seen around here in the forties and early fifties and says their present activity is caused by their resting place being disturbed by some of the buildings that have lately been erected. In the fight that took place when the soldier found he was betrayed before the Indians killed him, two braves, his treacherous sweetheart and another Indian maiden met their doom; hence the five specters that are now disturbing our peace.—San Jose (Cal.) Mercury.

A Freak Egg.

Farmer Corseglia, of south Jersey, has a rather neat thing in the way of freak eggs, the production of one of his Cochin hens. What the hen tried to do was to lay two eggs at once, but she only partially succeeded. Having produced one complete egg correct in size and shape, she managed, in trying instantly to duplicate it, to inclose it in a flexible sack of semiopaque skin, which also contained the complete yolk and white of another egg. The effect was therefore that of a hard egg and an egg that has been dropped out of its shell, both inclosed in a seamless bag about four inches long and two inches wide.

After accomplishing this very unusual feat Farmer Corseglia's Cochin hen raised such a disturbance in order to call attention to her achievement that she was set upon by half the feathered inhabitants of the barnyard and forced to roost on the henhouse roof to escape their jealous wrath. The row having attracted a farm hand's notice, he investigated the cause and the Cochin's prize production was carefully placed in a cigar box filled with bran and taken to Farmer Corseglia.—Philadelphia Record.

The Fatal Thirteen.

Nov. 29, 1891, F. C. Cole, an old soldier, died at the county hospital. A few veterans went to the hospital through a driving snowstorm to give him a soldier's burial. The ceremony was simple and none but the veterans were present to do honor to the dead man. As they left the cemetery a superstitious comrade found that he was one of a party of thirteen. He declared at once that some one of the number would die within the coming year. "I dont know who it will be," he said, "but the sign is certain." "I know," said Captain J. S. Jones; "it will be you, Hall," and he pointed to Lieutenant A. D. Hall. Recently twelve of those who attended Comrade Cole's funeral went to Oakwoods to lay away the body of Hall.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

No Boom at Jerusalem.

The land speculation scheme which was associated with the railroad project seems to have come to grief, and the land boom near Jaffa and Jerusalem, started a year or two ago, has collapsed. There is much fertile land near Jaffa and on the plains of Sharon, and the Jaffa oranges are in great demand, like our Florida Indian river oranges, but so many discouragements are thrown over all industrial enterprises by the Turkish government, that while Palestine continues under the control of that dog-in-the-manger power there is not much prospect of any great amount of business development in that country.—Washington Star.

Runs a Freight Train Without Rails.

A new way of railroading has been started in this section. Jacksonville is a small country town about ten miles from Homer City and has no railroad. An enterprising farmer from near that point, who owns a very good traction engine, has started a train for the purpose of hauling freight to and from that place. He leaves in the forenoon and makes the return trip in the afternoon. The chances are the traffic will be heavy over his line all summer.—Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

To Oppose English Lawyers.

A society has been formed in London under the title of the Witnesses' Protection society. The objects of the association are to protect witnesses from insult by counsel, to put the matter of contempt of court into the hands of a jury, and to raise a fund to indemnify contumacious witnesses from pecuniary loss, provided always that the questions they refuse to answer reflect upon their honor, and are at the same time irrelevant to the issues of the case.

DIED BY SCORES.

A Lake Steamboat That Became a Floating Charnel House.

PUTRID FISH CAUSED AN EPIDEMIC.

Eighty-five Immigrant Passengers Carried Off Within a Few Hours After Being Attacked.

The Alleghany was one of the best propellers of her day. She plied between Buffalo and Milwaukee. One day in midsummer, 1850, she left Buffalo harbor on her regular trip. She was in command of Captain Morrison. The passenger list included 40 cabin and 150 steerage passengers, the latter all Swedish immigrants. These were going in a body to Milwaukee, where several hundred of their countrymen had preceded them. They were being forwarded by some colonization society and were in charge of a Swede named Jansen, an agent of the society. With the exception of Jansen, not one of these people could speak a word of English. Their collective wealth amounted to $100,000 in cash, which was all in the possession of Jansen for safekeeping.

The Alleghany always stopped at Beaver island, which was held by King Strang with his colony of Mormon and free love followers. During the propeller's stop on this trip a little girl among the steerage passengers sickened and died, her sickness coming suddenly and death resulting two hours later. This little one's mother had died on the ocean voyage from Sweden and was buried at sea. The child was buried on King Strang's island.

The propeller proceeded on her way, but had got not more than an hour's sail from Little Beaver island when the father of the child died in the same manner that she had. Before the Alleghany arrived at South Manitou island 25 of the immigrants had died of the same mysterious disease, which was spreading rapidly among them. The sudden appearance of this deadly plague caused a panic on board.

The cabin passengers were placed in quarantine in their quarters, and the crew of the propeller were kept busy caring for the unfortunate Swedes. The propeller landed at Manitou and buried in one large trench the score and a half who were then lying dead on board the vessel. From Manitou there was no place where the steamer could touch before arriving at Milwaukee, and she left that island literally a floating charnel house. Scarcely an hour passed that an immigrant did not fall victim to the terrible plague, the origin of which no one at that time knew. It at last became impossible to attend to the wants of all the sufferers, although the entire crew devoted every minute, night and day, to their service. There was no mistaking those who were doomed to death among the immigrants.

The victim became hollow eyed and had a vacant, faraway look that was hard for another to meet. When that look appeared, death was but an hour or two away. Death always came with the most intense agony. One could look about among the stricken and count to a certainty those who would be dead within the next hour. The victims were weighted and cast overboard as soon as they were dead. Such a thing as shrouding or giving funeral service to a corpse was an impossibility. They were cast into the water just as they died.

Up to the day before the propeller arrived at Milwaukee none of the crew or officers had been attacked by the disease, but on that day the cook fell a victim to it, and was cast into the lake as the others had been. The clerk of the steamer, a young man named Gardiner, about this time had found among the stores a cask of New England rum. The story is that the engineer, a man named Curtis, soon after the cook's death, was attacked by the disease, and that Gardiner, without any idea of the result, had caused the doomed man to drink a glass of the rum. What the virtue of the rum was as a remedy for the disease no one ever knew, but the engineer did not die. Gardiner then dosed the immigrants with it as they fell sick, and in several cases the victims were saved. Gardiner, at the time he discovered the rum, discovered what he had reason to believe was the origin of the deadly disease. It was a barrel of putrid fish among the immigrant stores, of which poisonous food some of the poor people had eaten early in the voyage.

The propeller reached Milwaukee in the evening. There were then 12 dead Swedes aboard. The captain sent for physicians. They decided that the disease was some kind of fever usual in ships where passengers were closely quartered, but its exact nature they could not determine. The news of the terrible state of affairs on board the Alleghany was not slow in getting abroad in the town. No one, not even the officers, was allowed to remain anywhere in the city, and they were driven back to the melancholy surroundings on board. Next morning the authorities ordered the propeller to move away from the dock and out into the lake. This was done.

A new element then appeared in the unfortunate situation, and it for a time threatened serious trouble. The Swedes living in and about Milwaukee were made acquainted with the sad straits their fellow countrymen were in on board the Alleghany, and they marched to the dock in a body, 500 strong. They sent word to Captain Morrison that if he would run his vessel back to the dock they would prevent any interference with his landing. For a time a riot seemed inevitable, but a compromise was effected by the authorities making an agreement with Captain Morrison that he might land his passengers on scows and have them towed to an old storehouse that stood on the outskirts of the city. Three more deaths had occurred on the propeller pending this arrangement. The immigrants, or the 65 that remained of the 150 that left Buffalo, were quarantined in the storehouse, and the terrible disease was got in hand without any further deaths.

The wretchedness of the immigrants was made still greater by the baseness of the man Jansen, who had them in charge. Before the survivors of the plague were able to look after their interests Jansen disappeared, taking with him the $100,000 belonging to the party. He was never heard of afterward.

The young clerk, Gardiner, of the Alleghany, whose prescriptions of New England rum undoubtedly saved several of the stricken from death, among them Curtis, the engineer, is now one of the most conspicuous and wealthy of the citizens of Cleveland, of which city he has been several times mayor.—Buffalo Cor. New York Sun.

Cremation.

Cremation is now generally preferred to burial by the more intelligent portion of the community, and the day is not far distant when a crematory will be as necessary an adjunct to a cemetery as a gravedigger.—St. Paul Globe.

Against a Massachusetts Ruling.

The officers of the Illinois Humane society detailed to prosecute the participators in the tame fox hunt at Fairland are much disturbed over the methods of legal procedure in Douglas county. The action against the fox hunters was called before Justice Lamb at Tuscola. Witnesses testified before a jury that a tame fox had been chased by the defendants and their hounds and had been caught and torn to pieces by the latter. Attorney A. W. Thomas, of Chicago, cited a Massachusetts decision sustaining the position of the Humane society, which, while not denying the right of men to hunt and kill wild foxes, held that a tame fox, cared for in captivity by man from the time it was only a few days old, is a domestic animal.

C. W. Wolverton, of Tuscola, attorney for the defendants, then addressed the jury. He troubled himself but little about replying to arguments of the Chicago lawyer, but the fact that a Massachusetts decision had been cited severely wounded his local pride.

"Gentleman of the jury," he said, "we are residents of the state of Illinois in the glorious west—wild and wooly, if you will—where each man is an independent American citizen. What is Massachusetts? An alien commonwealth. It is Massachusetts. Why, gentlemen of the jury, on Boston common today witches are burned at the stake, and if a man is found outside of a church Sunday he is placed in a lockup. What has Massachusetts to do with us? We are American citizens and we want to chase foxes and we chase foxes."

After hearing which the twelve good men and true of Tuscola rendered a verdict for the defendants. The Humane society had hoped to make this a test case under the state laws, which provide that any person guilty of "torturing any animal" shall be subject to a fine of not more than $200. The Massachusetts decision was directly in point, and although the justice before whom the action was brought was manifestly impartial, the jury, which was composed largely of friends of the defendants, rendered a favorable decision on the question of law impossible.—Chicago Tribune.

Billiards Without Balls.

According to an eye witness a peculiar incident happened one evening recently in the billiard room of a hotel at Tacoma, Wash. The room was crowded and all of the billiard and pool tables were occupied but one. Two gentlemen entered the room attired in full evening dress. Engaging a billiard table the boy brought the balls, but the players, to his utter astonishment, told him they did not need them. Removing their topcoats, coats and hats, they took cues and commenced a mimic game.

They made the customary moves around the table, studied apparent plays, made the usual grimaces at misplays, and regularly counted their strings. A wondering crowd gathered about them. They thought the men were crazy. A funny part of it was that they never smiled, took the "guying" of the crowd serenely and, when the points were marked up, paid for the game and unconcernedly walked out. The solution of the mystery was that the imitation game was played on a wager.—Chicago Times.

Bloomed in an Hour.

A Belfast gentleman woke about 4:45 a. m. Sunday and glanced out the window at the clock on the Unitarian church, as was his custom of a morning, to see what time it was. Having found out he turned over for another nap. The next time he awoke he again glanced toward the steeple and was surprised to find that the budding leaves in the trees between his house and the clock had burst forth to such an extent that they shut out the clock so that he was unable to barely see the large face, let alone the hands. He was telling this circumstance to a neighbor later in the day, when the latter said he, too, noted the fact, as he also took time from the same clock.—Belfast Age.

An Electric Experience.

In Devonshire, England, one day recently, a party of young people were overtaken by a heavy shower of hailstones which lasted about ten minutes, and during that time they felt as though highly charged with electricity. The ladies of the party felt as though ants were running among their hair, which was fastened up with steel hairpins. One of the gentlemen held his hand to the head of one of the others and at once the hair stood on end. This was done several times with the same result, and for two or three days afterward their heads felt the effects of the electrical whipping.—London Letter.

Probably All in His Eye.

A freak of nature has come to light in the county jail at Fort Worth, Tex. His name is Jesse Lee, aged eighteen years. Turn the boy's face so that a strong light may shine into his eyes and a phenomenon is seen. Around the pupils of the eyes, in the iris, are the twenty-six letters of the alphabet arranged symmetrically. There are thirteen letters in each eye, those up to "M" being in the left eye and the remaining ones in the right. Lee says his father and four brothers are similarly affected.

A Ripley County Peach Tree.

W. S. Holladay, whose home is at Tucker, in Ripley county, Mo., has a curiosity in the peach tree line which he is thinking of sending to the World's fair. The tree is three years old, about an inch and a half in diameter at the butt, is thirty-seven feet high and has no limb or branch on it.—Doniphan (Mo.) Prospect News.

Blown from a Railway Train.

MODERN SCHOOL.

Teaching Boys to Sew and Patch and Girls to Carve Wood.

MISHAPS OF THE AMBITIOUS TOTS.

The Boys Prod Their Fingers With Needles and the Girls Draw Blood With Sharp Chisels.

Johnny sewing patchwork and Susan whittling kindling!

That is the vision of the future which the critic of manual training beholds with his prophetic eye. For confirmation he points you to the New York College for the Training of Teachers, where young Americans in trousers are pricking their fingers and learning bias from straight, and where the daughters of this new revolution are wading through gory seas to the goal of perfection in wood cutting and carving.

The boys begin their sewing lessons at an early age, one three years old being a member of the youngest class. Occasionally a spirit of rebellion crops out at the suggestion of sewing, as in the case of one little chap who professed a decided objection to an acquaintance with a needle and thimble on the score that he "didn't want to be a tailor." He is not alone in his opposition to the movement; therefore it may be as well to give the point of view of the teacher.

It is all explained under the magic phase, "manual training." It seems that there is not any particular desire to have the boys learn to sew. They do not care to manufacture tailors at the college any more than they want to make a seamstress of every girl who attends. But the children in the first classes are too young to take up such forms of manual training as wood cutting. They would simply slice themselves up like green cucumbers. Still, the little hands must be trained, and sewing is the only available method for young scholars who have completed the kindergarten course.

When there is any show of rebellion on the part of the boys who are to begin, there is one unfailing argument which is advanced. The teacher relates the skill of sailors and trained soldiers in the use of the needle, and, presto! Johnny seizes upon patchwork with an interest which will not be denied.

The other day a number of girls and boys, from six to nine years of age, were having their sewing lesson in one of the sunny rooms at the college. The girls, it must be admitted, were a little more graceful than the boys in their use of the needle, but their brothers were not to be outdone in practical results. They certainly did "screw" a good deal, from their tongues, which they rolled visibly within their cheeks, to their toes, which were painfully held on tiptoe, during the entire five minutes required by a novice to thread a needle.

"Ouch!" suddenly exclaimed a little fellow in the front seat, who, with his leg doubled under him, his fingers clutching a piece of muslin, his forehead knotted and his mouth puckered in harmony with his thread, was a picture of absorbed industry.

His "ouch" meant that he had pricked his fingers—which he promptly put in his mouth—and as the children were growing a little tired the teacher told them to put their work away and gave them a little talk on the materials and instruments used in sewing. Her talk that day was on cotton, some pods of which she had brought as an illustration, and the questions ranged over geography, climate, labor, machinery and a great number of related subjects.

It was a noticeable thing that when the order came to put away the work it was the boys who said:

"Oh, please let us sew some more!"

As they grow older and take up the other forms of manual training the boys want the sewing left out of their curriculum, so that there are few older than twelve who belong to the thread-and-needle classes. But their work is, on the average, quite as good as the girls while they continue it.

Over in the annex the drops of blood which the boys shed in their sewing are atoned for by the cut fingers which generally follow a girl's first introduction to real edged tools. The superintendent, however, said the other day that in cases where the girls enter at the same age that the boys do he can see no perceptible difference in their work. In the first course, which consists of whittling and cutting thin wood into figures, joining and polishing them, the girls do as well as the boys. In the advanced work of wood carving they are often much interested and do quite as well as the boys, provided they have had the same training. Otherwise they are not so strong and it takes some time to develop their muscles.

At the tables in the workroom stood a number of girls and boys wearing aprons of striped ticking, and cutting, sawing, drawing figures on wood, sandpapering and filing with energy and zeal enough to have convinced an observer of their interest in their work. The whirr of the machinery in the room below jarred the floor slightly, but the trained hand of a girl near the door was perfectly steady as she outlined a pattern of morning glories on a piece of hard maple. Then she picked out a gleaming chisel from the rack of tools in front of her and commenced to dig the wood out in little chips.

"My! but this is hard!" she said, as she paused to rest a moment.

Her neighbor glanced up sympathetically from her piece of work, her chisel slipped and——

"Ouch!" she exclaimed, as she stuck her finger in her mouth.

It was the echo of the little "seamster's" involuntary remark, and it really did seem as if boys who sew and say "ouch" and girls who whittle and say the same thing are pretty much of a piece.

At any rate, the teachers declare that boys and girls trained together do work which has always been considered individual to each separate class so equally well that you cannot tell a boy's stitches from a girl's or a feminine bit of whittling from that of a boy with generations of whittlers behind him.—New York World.

Etruscan Legends.

Legends about the Etruscans are numerous, but even with them and the numerous Etruscan inscriptions in the hands of scholars, the race to which they belonged, their language and history, are still an unsolved problem. Mr. Charles Godfrey Leland is about to make an important contribution to the literature of the subject in a voluminous work on Etruscan legends. For years he has passed his summers in Italy in the old Etruscan country, wandering among the peasants and collecting their stories. Their customs and superstitions date back to the old heathen times, and devil worship and the most primitive beliefs prevail among them even down to the present time.

BOSTON BABIES.

The Heirs of the Wealthy as They Appear on Commonwealth Avenue.

The Commonwealth avenue baby is a pattern of propriety, a paragon of excellence, a thing of beauty and a joy forever. Its papa does not walk the floor with it at night, and its mother does not drag it through the shopping district by day. A whole freight car of infant food and hobby horses is at the command of its pleasure, and copies of Browning are within easy reach. When it grows up, it can join the Algonquin club or marry a man able to provide a beautiful home and Parisian modes.

Attention, therefore, that the Commonwealth avenue baby may be studied both on its native heath and apart from its daily environment; that it may be compared with other babies and its status in public life definitely determined; that it may know the great interest taken in its welfare by all classes in the community; that it may learn to comport itself so as to be a model of elegance for all the world—the cosmopolitan Beau Brummel of all infants.

Commonwealth avenue from the Public garden to West Chester park is nine-tenths of a mile in length. In this stretch of ward 11's best territory the baby is pushed in its perambulator. Beyond West Chester park the avenue swings out into a lovely country, through which the baby is drawn in a carriage. This article deals only with those Commonwealth avenue babies that are pushed.

If the casual visitor to Boston reaches the avenue at 2 o'clock on a mild, sunshiny afternoon, he will find the sidewalks and the promenades in the park dotted with baby carriages. The street is 240 feet wide from house to house, or 200 feet from curb to curb. Fully one-quarter of this is available for promenade. This gives an area of 240,000 square feet available to be dotted by baby carriages. If the babies travel 10 feet apart, which is a fair estimate, the size of each dot will be 100 square feet. This will allow for the presence of 2,400 babies.

Think of it! Twenty-four hundred infants out for an afternoon's airing! Twenty-four hundred pairs of tiny feet, 2,400 pairs of bright eyes, 2,400 frocks with appropriate monograms, 2,400 little mouths lisping "Thank you" and "I beg pardon," 2,400 nursegirls at a weekly salary of $4, total $9,600. Can New York or Philadelphia or Chicago produce Commonwealth avenue's equal in this respect? No; there is nothing like it anywhere.

Figures may lie, and circumstances may alter the number and position of the dots, but the fact remains that a sunny day brings out infants on the great Back Bay avenue in a way to beat all records. The procession from West Chester park to Arlington street is wide and continuous. The investigator from other cities is appalled by the exhibit. All doubts as to the productiveness of the Back Bay family are set at rest. The future custodians of ward 11's $146,480,500 worth of property are already on the ground. The cruel slander that the modern rich American family has no children here meets an emphatic refutation.—Boston Herald.

The Engineer's Day.

Where there are no regular runs and the men run "first in first out," it is almost impossible to always have just work enough to go around. The men are as much to blame as the management for the overwork of engineers. They are paid on mountain roads $4 per day. Days are not measured by hours, but by miles. Forty-four mountain or 85 valley miles is a day on freight. On passenger service 105 valley miles is a day's work. The point between valley and mountain mileage is passed when the grade exceeds 200 feet to the mile. Men have made 60 days in a month on these mountains, and they have earned the $240, but they should not have been allowed to do it.

One young man, Hyatt by name, used to threaten to put himself into a receiver's hands when he made less than 40 days a month. Fifty days was fair business, but 60 suited him better. He kept it up for three years, collapsed and had to be hurried out of the country. I don't know that he ever wholly recovered. He was a fine fellow physically, sober and strong, or he would have collapsed sooner. I am afraid the older engineers are a little selfish. When the management proposes to employ more men or promote some firemen, there is usually a protest from the older runners.—McClure's Magazine.

Rev. Mather Byles.

The Rev. Mather Byles of Boston, who preached there in 1776, one fast day effected an exchange with a country clergyman, and each went on horseback to the appointed place. They met by the way, and Dr. Byles no sooner saw his friend approaching than he put spurs to his horse and passed him at full gallop. "What is the matter?" cried the other in astonishment. "Why so fast, Brother Byles?" Brother Byles shouted over his shoulder, without slackening speed, "It is fast day!" One day when he was busy in nailing some list upon his doors to exclude the cold a parishioner called to him, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, Dr. Byles!" "Yes, sir," replied the doctor, "and man listeth where the wind bloweth." He was once arrested as a Tory, tried, convicted and sentenced to confinement on board a guardship to be sent to England with his family in 40 days. A sentinel was placed over him. He was removed, replaced and again removed. "I have been guarded, regarded and disregarded," said the doctor. He spoke humorously of his sentinel as his "observe-a-Tory."—San Francisco Argonaut.

Cobwebs and Cuts.

The cry of modern surgery is for chemical cleanliness, and the deluded man or woman who binds a small poultice of microbes, otherwise cobwebs, over a fresh cut as a healing agency is a candidate for Bloomingdale. Pressure will stop the bleeding, if it is not arterial, and will help that. Whether an artery has been tampered with or not is shown by the way the cut bleeds. A pumping flow or a steady spouting stream indicates that it has. Press firmly while the nearest physician is summoned. For ordinary cuts, even those which bleed profusely, firm pressure right upon them will soon check the flow. Then wash them thoroughly in clear hot water, draw the edges together and put strips of court or surgeon's plaster across. Strips should be used instead of a single piece to afford vent for any pus that should gather. The washing is especially necessary when the cut is made by glass or tin, lest any bit of foreign material remain in the wound to fester.—New York Times.

MARRIED.

RHINE—COLLINS—At Los Angeles, April 9, 1894, Mr. Bertrand Rhine and Miss Leora B. Collins, both of Independence.

Bar silver, 62½.

J. J. Crum has returned to Modock.

See the notice for proposals published this week.

Prospects are favorable for the best fruit season in years.

O. I. Mairs will return from Los Angeles early next week.

Weather cloudy to-day, with strong indications of rain.

Henry McMurry and R. J. Wittaker of Big Pine were in town to-day.

John F. Logan, State Treasurer of Nevada, died at Carson last Saturday.

Heath is to be tried the third time for the murder of McWhirter at Fresno.

The locust trees are all in bloom and the air is filled with a delightful fragrance.

Morrell, the partner of Chris. Evans, has been sentenced to State Prison for life.

J. A. McKenzie and A. C. Harvey of Lone Pine were in town early in the week.

T. C. Boland and W. M. Richards came up from Keeler last Sunday, returning next day.

Henry Levy and daughter, Miss Minnie Levy, arrived home from San Francisco last Monday.

Dr. Keables, County Physician of Mono county, is a candidate for the Republican nomination for Assemblyman in this District.

There are several parties now on their way here from Los Angeles who wish to purchase land in Owens Valley and make their homes here.

P. H. Mack Esq., C. Mulholland and F. G. Brooks started for Los Angeles last Sunday via Mojave. They are expected to return early next week.

A. W. Eibeshutz went to Bishop yesterday, returning to-day. Mr. Eibeshutz has received his appointment as Receiver of the U. S. Land Office at Independence.

A. McKillips and family arrived here from San Bernardino last Monday. They left here over a year ago but like all others they find Owens Valley a good country to stay with.

N. C. Young arrived hers on Wednesday on his way home to Bishop from Los Angeles. Howard G. Hall, an old Pinmas acquaintance, accompanied him and expects to make his home in Inyo.

The Independence school closes to-day for the term. There will be no closing exercises as Mr. Janvier has the just opinion that every moment of the term can be more profitably employed with the regular studies.

Bertrand Rhine and Miss Leora B. Collins were united in marriage at Los Angeles on the 9th and started for San Francisco next day on their honeymoon. They are expected to arrive here about a month hence, where they will make their future home. We wish the young people every possible happiness in their new estate.

His Last Race.

Fred B., the brown trotting horse owned by Irv. H. Mulholland, died on Wednesday at the ripe age of 23 years. Nearly everybody in the Valley knew "Old Fred." He trotted the fastest mile ever made in the District and never lost a heat. His last race was against Judge Kyle and Pete at Independence two years ago; and although then 21 years old he had all the nerve of a colt, winning the race in three straight heats, the last heat being the fastest. He had trotted on nearly every track in the State and made one campaign on the Eastern tracks. He was a game and resolute race horse and had a remarkably kind and gentle disposition. We had known him for 16 years and it seemed like losing an old friend.

Papa Chalfant Again Braying.

The Register again has a grievance. This time it is Papa Chalfant, as "Willie Boy" is at the Mid-winter Fair, where we sincerely hope he will profit by "papa's" experience and not get "buncoed." It is about the Great Register contract and he has made so many misstatements that the conclusion is inevitable that he is an unmitigated liar. He says that he had no representative before the Board: W. T. Bunney filed his bid at his request, showed the Board an inoperative law and endeavored to convince them upon the fifteen day proposition. Before letting the contract the Board asked for the opinion, and acted upon it, of Jas. E. Parker; a man who has forgotten more of the printer's craft than Papa Chalfant ever knew, and is still as expert a printer as there is in the County. Papa Chalfant lies again, and herein betrays his grossest stupidity: He says that his bid this year was 2 cents per name higher than the work cost last time. The fact is that it was exactly the same, 17 cents per name, while his bid at that time was 20 cents. Considering the pro rata of work the register will this year be printed at less cost than the last one, when there were but 300 copies required while this year there must be 400, an increase of 33⅓ per cent. in material and press work. Mr. Parker represented to the Board that copy could not be sent to Bishop on Tuesday preceding the election and the registers received for distribution to the various precincts in due time without hiring a special messenger for Panamint at least, at a cost equaling the difference in price. Furthermore, by having the work done here the proofs can be read from the original and any errors corrected. As everybody knows Mr. Parker has no interest whatever in the INDEPENDENT or its proprietor; and he, a competent printer, stated to the Board that 25 cents per name would be a fair price, that being the average price in all other counties of the State. We were willing to do the work at the lowest living wages and took the contract at 20 cents per name. Printing is our business; we don't run a child's-play institution with a fat County office to back us up. We did, as Papa Chalfant says, "wrestle with the Board" on one proposition—that of having all printing done in the County that possibly could be. But Papa Chalfant is forced to admit that we were unselfish in this, as "Willie Boy" gets three-fourths of such job printing and we never kick about it either. And in what a ridiculous light he endeavors to place the business men of Bishop—his "clientage" he calls them. As though they cared one bawbee whether Papa Chalfant and his "Willie Boy" spent the $170 he might have received for the register among them or in paying the Chalfant family expenses, bunco steerers included, at the Mid-winter Fair. He betrays the whole animus of his tirade against the Board when he singles out Supervisor Uhlmeyer for special animadversion. The report has reached his asinine appendages that Mr. Uhlmeyer will be a candidate for Assessor, and "Old Moses," who with eight years steady diet at the County crib has covered his lean ribs with fat, evidently wants that stall all to himself and is determined to kick out any intruder. The records of the Board of Supervisors will show that in every instance where Mr. Uhlmeyer was given a preference he voted for the Index. We have never asked him for a favor and have never received one. In the matter of the Great Register he simply used his prerogative of acting for the best good of the county. The Board had an experience two years ago in the matter of the ballots that they have not forgotten. Supervisor Uhlmeyer was just as consistent in voting for the register contract as Supervisor Love in voting for Dr. Blair for County Physician, although his was the highest bid by $150. Both men had a perfect right to act according to their best judgment, and no one except the Index has ever accused Supervisor Love of "reckless extravagance"—He does not want to be Assessor.

Prosperous Times Ahead.

There is a strong tide of immigration setting in toward Owens Valley and the coming summer will witness the arrival of an unprecedented number of new settlers. Many of these are people with sufficient means to locate and improve new homes and create taxable property, others will purchase farms already improved. It is true that in the settling up of every new country there will be a certain number of vagabonds, and we cannot hope to escape this evil any more than have other countries. Rev. E. McEvers writes from Washington that there are now twenty families, all good, industrious people, on their way here, and that more will follow. On the East Side alone there are 30,000 acres of land under a good system of irrigating canals that for several years has been ready for settlement. Industrious people with small means have excellent opportunities here to make themselves homes. The completion of the Indian Wells Valley canal will open up another very extensive territory for settlement. An increase in the population of this county from 4,000 to to ten times that number within the next few years is not only possible but highly probable. And who is there to say that this is not for the best good of all? In the neighborhood of Bishop is a large area of the most fertile land, all covered with an excellent system of irrigating canals, that only awaits a sufficient number of settlers to bring every foot of it under cultivation. The Big Pine canal opens up another extensive body of land, and the Lone Pine Canal Co. will let a contract next month for the extension of their canal, which, when completed, will render cultivable several thousand acres more of excellent land. The great loss of crops this year on the unirrigated lands of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valley will teach people the inestimable value of irrigation and cause our lands, where crops are a certainty every year, to be eagerly sought after. This fact more than anything else will hasten the settlement of this Valley. The settling up of all the land now unproductive will greatly increase the value of the lands under cultivation; and more especially will it benefit those who now have orchards in caring. It is a fact patent to all that an era of great prosperity is in store for us.

A Needed Reform.

There is a movement on foot for the organization of a gun club in the Valley for the preservation of game. Such an institution is greatly needed for the enforcement of the game laws. For several years some miscreants have been in the habit of turning the creeks and destroying the trout fishing. Last week the south fork of Oak Creek was turned in five places. The parties doing this should be punished to the full extent of the law, and the only way to catch the depredators is to hire a man to watch the streams; this can be done by a gun club, and the expense on each member be light. In the years to come many visitors will be attracted to the Valley during the summer months for fishing and hunting and we cannot afford to let the sport be utterly ruined by the wanton destruction of game caused by turning the streams and spearing female trout while spawning and by trapping quail in season and out of season. A sportsman club should be formed at once and a good, responsible man hired as game-keeper, who will perform his duties fearlessly, no matter who the offending parties may be.

To The Public.

Inyo's representative at the Midwinter Fair, Mr. G. P. Rixford, has informed the Executive Committee that the space is now ready for the reception of exhibits. Parties having anything to exhibit will kindly leave the same with the representative in their vicinity for shipment. Bring on all you have. Small exhibits from all will make up a large general display. The following are authorized to receive exhibits: John Bourland, Bishop; R. W. Thomas, Big Pine; A. W. Eibeshutz, Independence; E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine.

ELECTIONS IN CORSICA.

The Loss of a Life or Two Apparently Not of Much Account.

The elections for the council general were going on all over the island of Corsica. The canton of Soccia comprises several villages, among others Guagno, noted for its famous mineral springs and also for the turbulence of its people. The elections took place in each village, and on the morrow the presidents of the several bureaus were to meet at Soccia for the formal declaration of the poll. In consequence of certain disorders that had already occurred, the mayor of Soccia issued an edict to the effect that none of the inhabitants of Guagno was to enter the village that day.

The inhabitants of Guagno chose to ignore this order, and 60 of them, all armed, and all angry that their candidate had been defeated, marched upon Soccia, headed by their mayor. Two gendarmes—not armed—had been placed at the entrance of the village and warned the advancing troops that they were to come no farther. The mayor of Guagno cried "Fire!" There was a general volley from his followers, and the two gendarmes fell dead. "They both bore excellent characters. One of them had been 24 years in the service, had been proposed for the military medal and leaves a wife and three children."

Such was the first account in the daily paper of Bastia. It occupied about seven inches of one column. The next day the editor had had time to reflect (or he, too, may possibly have had a significant warning), for in an article three inches long the account was somewhat qualified, and there was this important emendation, "It seems we were not correct in stating that it was the mayor of Guagno who gave the order to fire upon the gendarmes."

The third day there were just two lines, "In consequence of the unfortunate affair at Soccia it is probable that the mayor of Guagno will send in his resignation." That was all. I took in the newspaper regularly for a week, for I was curious to see how the affair would end, but there was nothing more—apparently no inquiry, no prosecution of the offenders.—Contemporary Review.

The Tower of Silence.

The Parsees will not burn or bury their dead, because they consider a dead body impure, and they will not suffer themselves to defile any of the elements. They therefore expose their corpses to vultures. One sees nothing but the quiet, white robed procession (white is mourning among the Parsees) following the bier to the Tower of Silence. At the entrance they look their last on the dead, and the corpse bearers—a caste of such—carry it within the precincts and lay it down, to be finally disposed of by the vultures which crowd the tower.

Meanwhile, and for three days after, the priests say constant prayers for the departed, for his soul is supposed not to leave the world till the fourth day after death. On the fourth day there is the Uthanna ceremony, when large sums of money are given away in memory of the departed. The liturgy in use is a series of funeral sermons by Zoroaster.

Of superstitions the Parsees have had more than they retain. Connected with burial is the popular conception as to the efficacy of a dog's gaze after death. Dogs are sacred and supposed to guide the souls of the dead to heaven and to ward off evil spirits; hence it is customary to lead a dog into the chamber of death, that he may look at the corpse before it is carried to the tower.—Nineteenth Century.

Eccentricities In Palaces.

The King of Siam, who, according to late reports, has had a palace constructed which he can submerge in the sea at will and so live under water whenever he chooses, is not the only monarch who has indulged in eccentricities of this sort.

For instance, history has preserved the memory of the ice palace built by the Russian Empress Anne, who punished several of her dainty courtiers by compelling them to pass the night in this great chamber of state, where they were almost frozen to death.

The Czar Paul, ancestor of the present Emperor of Russia, constructed a room formed entirely of huge mirrors, where he spent hours walking to and from in full uniform—a singular taste for the ugliest man in Russia.

One of the native princes of Java cooled his palace by making a stream fall in a cascade over the gateway, and the Indian despot Tippo Sahib placed beside his dinner table a life size figure of a tiger devouring an English officer, the roar of the beast and the shrieks of the victim being imitated by hidden machinery.—Harper's Young People.

Triple Pillar Saw Frame.

Among the recent mechanical constructions of note is a triple pillar saw frame, conveniently designed to occupy a space not much wider than an ordinary vertical log frame. In carrying out this plan the cross girder, which carries the saw frame and the crank shaft bearings, is in one piece, the whole being supported on three turned pillars, on which by means of screws connected by suitable gearing they are raised and lowered together. In order to limit the distance between the pillars as much as possible, the connecting rod is attached to the saw frame that is farthest from the crank shaft. There is a bell crank and flywheel at each end of the crank shaft, which enable the machine to work steadily at high speeds without excessive vibration.—New York Sun.

One For the Turk.

One of the stories that drifted out of the plaisance is of the mosque where prayers were said daily at regular intervals for the natives. A pious woman passing accosted a young Oriental and chatted with him, finishing with a nod toward his prayer house and the remark, "I hope you go to church every Sunday, like a Christian." "No," was the quick reply, "I go every day, like a Turk"—which must score one for the heathen.—New York Times.

Under the Monroe Doctrine.

Should European vessels land their forces and interfere in the affairs of Brazil, there is no escape from the conclusion that such act would constitute a cause of offense to the United States government. Under the light of the Monroe doctrine the administration can construe such acts as nothing less than an offense. If Europe can without let or hindrance land troops in Brazil and menace the security of that republic, Europe can do likewise in every American republic.—Minneapolis Tribune.

ABSOLUTELY PURE

In June.

The birds come back to their last year's nest,
And the wild rose nods in the lane;
And gold in the east, and red in the west,
The sun bestirs him again.

The thief bee rifles the jasmine flower,
And the breezes softly sigh
For the Columbine in my lady's bower,
And then at her feet they die.

And all the pomp of the June is here—
The mirth and passion and song;
And young is the summer, and life is dear,
And the day is never too long.

Ah! birds come back to their last year's nest,
And the wild rose laughs in the lane;
But I turn to the east and I turn to the west—
She never will come again.
—Louise Chandler Moulton in Wide Awake.

About to Sue.

A man who lets out dress suits at two dollars per night threatens to go into court and sue for $792 for the use of a suit that couldn't have cost more than twenty dollars in the first instance.

This is how it happened. A member of an arctic expedition, encamped just now, or supposed to be, somewhere within gunshot of the north pole, was tendered a reception by some friends on the night before his departure. He secured a pair of patent leather shoes, a clean shirt and a satin necktie from somewhere or other, but the dress suit he hired from the agent referred to.

Next morning the explorer's mother packed the suit in his Saratoga trunk, not knowing that it wasn't his, and he took it up to the north pole with him. It has been used doubtless at the principal blubber feeds and walrus hunts to impress the natives.

But the dress suit loaner wants two dollars a day for every day he has been deprived of the use of the clothes, and by the time the explorer gets back the bill will be $792, thirteen months being the length of his absence. A deep legal question will doubtless arise, but the agent is firm and says that he means to get his rights.—New York Herald.

A Duel Nipped in the Bud.

A duel between two young men has been nipped in the bud at Buena Vista, Va., by Mayor White. Mr. J. G. Seay sent a challenge to fight a duel to Mr. Edmund Randolph. Young Randolph paid no attention to the challenge and a second challenge was sent by Seay.

Young Randolph referred the correspondence to his friend, Mr. R. B. Williamson, and before any details could be arranged the police arrested Seay, who was carried before the mayor and bailed to appear at the next term of the corporation court. Young Seay is about twenty years of age and was educated at the Virginia Military institute. Mr Randolph, who is about twenty-one, is teller in the First National bank.

Both young men are highly connected and respected. The difficulty was caused by a misunderstanding between the young men as to an engagement, Seay claiming that Randolph purposely avoided him and thus treated him disrespectfully. No further trouble is apprehended.—Richmond Dispatch.

Arizona's Great Irrigation Canal.

Yuma's great canal is the most gigantic irrigation enterprise as yet taken in hand in Arizona. To tunnel through a hill or mountain side so as to take the water of the Colorado without damming the stream, which is the present plan and that recommended by the English irrigation engineers, then to bring the water down on both sides of the river, with an aqueduct across the Gila, so as to irrigate the 2,000,000 acres of rich land lying adjacent to Yuma, in Arizona, California, Sonora, Lower California; in fact, to build this canal ninety miles in length, 100 feet in width at the bottom and twelve feet deep, is not the work of an hour nor the task of a child, and yet this is but the outline of this great work, all of which is going to be done, and that, too, in the near future.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Sponging a Patient.

When sponging the whole body do not expose more of the surface of the body at one time than can be quickly gone over, rapidly dried and at once recovered. If the sponging has been ordered to reduce temperature, it should be done with water at 100 degs., and containing some alcohol to aid evaporation. The sponging must be done under cover of a sheet, and the sponge must not be wet enough to dampen the covering. Do not dry, but allow the moisture to evaporate. Such a sponging at stated times is most refreshing to a burning fever patient, and never fails to bring the desired result—a reduced temperature, quiet nerves and refreshing sleep.—Arkansaw Traveler.

An Expression Seven Centuries Old.

"Hauling over the coals" dates six or seven centuries back, when feudal barons often used harsh methods of exacting gold from the rich Jews by suspending their victims above slow fires until they paid ransom or died. There is a scene of this sort in "Ivanhoe," in which the Templar endeavors to extort money from Isaac of York, father of Rebecca. —Detroit Free Press.

A RITTENHOUSE CLOCK.

By JNO. GILMER SPEED.

"That was a lucky find this morning. That bag of gold had been lost for fifty years, and during all that while one of the best men in the world has been more than half suspected by me of having stolen it." Looking at his wife, he added, "My God! how could I have forgotten that I placed it there?"

"What is it all about, sir?" I asked.

The colonel then told the story very much as I have told it to you, but he never told us what was the full name of the young Scotchman, as he always spoke of him as John. He was much moved as he told the tale, and my grandmother took off her spectacles many times to remove the moisture that dimmed the glasses. "To-morrow," he added, "you shall meet this man and help me to make amends for the dreadful wrong which my forgetfulness has done him."

The colonel's sleigh was sent to the station the next morning to meet the New York train. Returning, it was driven rapidly to the counting room, and there Col. and Mrs. Curtis met the man from whom they had parted fifty years before under such peculiarly painful circumstances. The interview seemed to be a long one to us, who were waiting, but it really had lasted only about half an hour when the bell was rung, and the man who answered it was directed to invite us to go over to the counting room. We were surprised when we opened the door to find with my grandfather and grandmother Mr. John Carlisle, the father of my wife's mother. He was as astonished to see us as we were to see him.

"This is the young lady who found the bag," my grandmother said.

"What, Lois?" Mr. Carlisle exclaimed as he came forward and put his arms about her and kissed her. Then turning to my grandfather he said with his arms still about my wife, "I did not know till now, Col. Curtis, that the young doctor my granddaughter insisted on marrying was a member of your family."

As soon as the old gentleman saw the bag his face became pale.

"Nor did I know that she was your granddaughter, John," the colonel said; "but I congratulate her on being of such good stock. And you, sir," said he turning to me, "I hope that as long as you live that you will remember the debt I owe to your wife's grandfather, and as I cannot live long enough to pay even a small part of it, you must try to make it up in some way to her and her children."

And, please God—said Dr. Curtis as he took off his hat and knocked the ashes from his pipe—I hope that I shall.

As Dr. Curtis finished his story the musical bell of the old clock struck 6.

"Every time I hear the old clock strike," the doctor added, "I renew my vow to make up as best I can to John Carlisle's grandchild and great-grandchildren for the serious wrong which my grandfather's lapse of memory did to him during that weary fifty years."

THE END.

Long Nursing.

It is exceptional in these days for a woman to properly nourish a child exclusively from the breast for twelve months. It is therefore exceedingly improbable that a breast will be adequate for sixteen months, unless food is given in addition. Of course there may be a rare exception, but in our experience we have never seen a child, as we considered, properly nourished on the breast for so long. The chances of the child would, in our judgment, be better on good artificial food than on breast milk so old. Even if you change, good milk can be had almost everywhere with care, and with care it can be rendered safe for food. Trouble and anxiety do not count when the safety of a baby is in question. Further, if you really cannot get good milk there are good substitutes in the form of prepared foods, which may be used for longer or shorter periods, as necessary.—Babyhood.

A Mountain Dream.

By JOSEPHINE A. BOWEN.

[Copyright by American Press Association.]

CHAPTER I.

"Knight and I never get tired."

Yes, I will tell you the story. Throw a few more logs into the stove, will you? Cold out doors?

"Cold? I suppose so; thermometer 40 below, but I'm blest if I feel it much. Your mountain air is wonderful to me. Been living on it ever since I came west."

Oh, we soon get used to it, and then our only wonder is how we ever consented to live where the deadly damp and chill is like a chronic ague. No more of it for me. The valley states have their good features, of course—orchards and corn fields and all that—good to look at when there are no mountains in sight; but of what use would they be here? Plenty of fruit to be had if you want it. Gad, how I used to work when I was a kid! Wading through the black soil of Illinois, dropping corn as soon as I shed my dresses; then covered and hoed and plowed and husked until I got disgusted, cut the whole business and lit out.

"Wasn't cut out for a king of the soil, eh?"

King of nothing! If a boy wants a taste of Inferno let him live on a farm and have a Dutchman for a father.

"Granted; but perhaps you inherited from your good German ancestors the artistic talent which enabled you to get on so well after you did cut and run."

Well, may be so. At any rate I have no quarrel with the old man now. He likes his farm and his fat cattle—I like my den here in the mountains, and my paints and brushes. So here I mean to stay. Pile in some more pine, Jim. I tell you, you might freeze to death and never know it.

"Smooth way to pass over the range to Paradise. But I say, Gus, don't you ever eat here? I am as hungry as a bear."

Eat? Open that oven door and take a whiff. That is the finest roast of venison in Montana, and ranch potatoes which are a poem. Nearly done, old man. Here, let me set the table: Two plates, two knives, two glasses, and there you are—or would you like some coffee? Have it ready in three minutes. Talk about the refinements of civilization! I suppose you newspaper fellows have to have a printed programme with your grub, a napkin and a silver fork and all that sort of trumpery; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death. Supper is ready. Better keep your hat on.

"All right; that doesn't bother me any; but say, Gus, give me that yarn. That is what I am here for, and I have just two hours to get back to Helena."

You're going to stay all night or no story. I don't have a visitor often, I can tell you, and you don't give me the cold shake. Stay till morning, get a good snooze once in your life—you look as if you needed it—and I will see you over the range in time to catch the 9:30 train. Is it a go?

"Well, I guess so. I ought to be in Denver in thirty-six hours, but I will trump up some lie to satisfy the manager if I am too late for the Sunday issue. By the way, Gus, what a happy life yours is. Sleep as long as you please, dress as you please, eat when you are hungry and work when the fit comes on. Happy man!"

That's all right, Jim—for me. You would loathe yourself in a week, if you should try it. Don't quarrel with your destiny. You are a man of action—your place is in the world. I am a dreamer, a mixer of paints and—a failure.

"A failure, are you? If you could hear the comments on your picture and the stir it has made in Denver you would sing another tune, I swear. You would be as proud as a peacock—and, by the way, I was to ask you if she is for sale."

Who? Oh, my picture! No; not if I was starving. That picture is a part of my life, Jim. My heart's blood mixed the colors on that canvas, and when Helmer begged the loan of it for a month I did not suppose that he was going to place it on exhibition for a lot of idiots to gabble over.

"Of whom I am the chief."

Not at all, Jim. I know you have a heart, although you may not believe it, or I would never tell you the story of my "Mountain Dream."

"Well, proceed. I will admit the heart if you will get down to business—note book and pencil all ready."

It was away back in '70 that I built a cabin here, thinking that it would be a good studio for the summer. I had no notion then that I would occupy it more than a few months. I enjoyed it immensely for a time and set to work with a will, making sketches of the scenery. It was new and very fascinating work, too. The atmospheric effects were so different from anything I had ever experienced, the coloring so new, that I was in a sort of artistic frenzy for once in my life, and scarcely knew whether I ate or not.

I had been here about six weeks and had made a good many studies, which I meant to finish up when I returned to the east. I was in earnest and ambitious then, and had my dreams of fame and my hopes of the future as other men have, I suppose. I had seen no one with the exception of a few prospectors on the hunt for gold and silver. They minded their own business, as men soon learned to do in those days, and I was not bothered nor my privacy intruded upon. But one day as I sat busily painting I heard a step, a soft rustle and looked up to see a vision in my doorway. A young girl, but little more than 15 years of age, stood there with her hand resting upon the head of a great mastiff dog. The sight was so unexpected that for a moment I thought of optical illusions and rubbed my eyes, expecting the picture to vanish; but instead, it advanced, and the dog came and poked his cold nose into my hand, asking, after the manner of his kind, for notice and caresses. As for his mistress, she stood looking about her as a child might have done, and indeed she was but little more.

"Have you lost your way?" I asked her gently.

"Oh, no, sir," she said with a faint smile. "Knight and I never get lost. Do we, Knight?"

At the mention of his name the dog turned and stood by her, and I was glad to see that he would indeed be a reckless man who would dare molest her.

"Will you sit down and rest?" I asked, pushing one of my two camp stools toward her.

"Knight and I never get tired, do we, Knight?" she asked; but she sat down and put her arm around the dog's neck.

"Do you live here?" she asked.

I replied that I did, and fell to wondering where the child could have strayed from. She now caught sight of my work and drew near me with wonder in her eyes.

"You must be like God," she said, "to make mountains and canyons like that."

"You give me greater praise than I deserve," I said; "but here are some more pictures—will you look at them?"

I turned them for her, and it was a strange sensation to watch her face, filled as it was with wonder and awe.

"Do you like pictures?" I asked.

"I never saw any before," she said, "except black and white ones—little ones, you know, in papers and books. I liked them, but these! Oh!"— She clasped her hands and I saw that she was trembling. "I didn't think that anybody in the world could make pictures like these."

While she looked at them I looked at her, and my wonder grew as I gazed. She was a slender little creature, olive skinned, and with a great mass of dusky hair gathered into a braid which hung below her waist. Her features were delicate and regular, her eyes large, brown and full of the slumbering fires of unawakened womanhood; but her mouth was the feature that caught and riveted my attention. It was so unchildlike, so inexpressibly sad in the pathetic curves of the small red lips.

"Does your Knight like pictures?" I asked, trying to win a smile. The faintest ghost of one crossed her face.

"Yes, he likes whatever I like," she answered. "Knight knows as much as any of us."

I returned to my sketching in some embarrassment. Had she been, indeed, the child I at first supposed, to question her or amuse her would have been easy; but as it was I could only await her pleasure. Presently she came to my side.

"My mother used to say," she said timidly, "that if I prayed to the Holy Mother Mary she would hear me and give me what I asked for. Do you think she will?"

"I hope so, with all my heart," I answered, "but what do you wish for most of all?"

"To make pictures, as you do."

"You say your mother used to tell you so. Is she, then, no longer living?"

"She is dead. She died years ago, when I was a little girl, but I remember what she told me. My father has another wife now. She has Mexican blood; she is cruel."

"Not to you?" I said doubtfully.

"Yes, to me and everybody except Knight. She is afraid of Knight."

"I am glad of that," I replied; "but surely she cannot hurt you very much now. You are almost a woman and can defend yourself."

"She is large and strong and cruel. She shakes me," went on the plaintive voice.

"But your father—surely if he knew"——

"He knows, but he loves her."

"He loves you, too, I suppose?"

"He hates me," she answered in the same sad, level voice, "and so I run away when I can and stay all day."

"And when you go home?"

"They beat me sometimes."

In the interest and sympathy awakened by her confession I forgot my reserve.

"What is your name?" I asked.

"Carol Cleaves."

"Cleaves!" I sprang to my feet in astonishment, for that was the name of a notorious outlaw, whose record was black with crime. And this lovely child, could it be possible that she claimed such paternity?

She looked at me wistfully. "I will go now," she said.

"Stay a moment," I entreated, in perplexity. Was there no way in which I could help her? I thought rapidly for a few moments. "Will you come again," I asked, "and let me paint a picture of you and Knight?"

Her eyes answered me; such a look of glorified surprise came into them. "Oh, will you? Can you?"

"I can and will, if you will come here a little while as often as convenient."

"I shall have to run away, but I will come."

"And if they are angry and punish you?"

"I shall not care, but they will never know where I am. If Mannella knew she would kill me. She said she would kill me if I ever spoke to any man."

"She shall not harm you," I boldly promised.

AN UNSEEN ENEMY

Is more to be dreaded than an open and visible one. That subtile and lurking foe, which under the generic name of malaria manifests itself, when it clutches us in its tenacious grasp, in the various forms of chills and fever, bilious remittent, dumb ague or ague cake, can only be effectually guarded against by fortifying the system against its insidious attacks with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a thorough antidote to the poison of miasma in the system, and a safeguard against it thoroughly to be relied upon. In the event of a malarious attack, avoid poisoning your system with quinine, and use instead this wholesome remedy, unobjectionable in taste and far more efficacious than any drug. Use the Bitters for dyspepsia, biliousness, constipation, kidney complaints and rheumatism.

There is no bigger fool in the world than the man who is expecting to get to heaven because his wife belongs to the church.

NERVOUS DYSPEPSIA.

The failure of the nerves of the stomach to perform their functions is the cause of nervous dyspepsia, a most exhausting form of disease. Allcock's Porous Plasters are an excellent remedy.

Senator James F. Pierce, of New York, writes:

"For the past two years I have suffered very much from an aggravated form of nervous dyspepsia. I have resorted to various remedial agents, deriving but little benefit. A few months since a friend of mine suggested the trial of Allcock's Porous Plasters. Following the suggestions, I have been using the same with the happiest effects. To those similarly afflicted let me suggest the manner of their use. I place one over my stomach, one over the hepatic region, and one on my back. The effect is excellent. From the day I commenced their use I have been slowly but surely improving, and am quite confident that by continuing I shall again be restored to my accustomed health."

A Lively Well.

A Bellaire, O., dispatch says: "There is much excitement in this section over a wonderful well on Pawpaw creek, near Salem, a village on the Cleveland and Marietta railroad, fifteen miles south of Summerfield, Noble county. A well was drilled to the depth of 1,400 feet about nineteen years ago. Oil or gas not being found it was abandoned. Several years later water and gas commenced coming from the hole in great force, which threw the tubing out. That gave it a chance and it washed out a large cavity, forty feet in diameter. Six or seven years ago it ceased to flow. Jacob Martz, about two years ago, filled the hole with logs, stone and earth and built a large barn on stone pillars, one of which stood in the center of the cavity.

"Recently gas burst up alongside the pillar with a report like that of thunder, a large flow of oil and water followed, and before a half hour passed around the pillar began to sink and was soon out of sight. In twenty-eight hours a basin some thirty-five feet in diameter and no one can tell how deep was formed and was filled with water, which is constantly in motion, and the earth for several feet around it also moves up and down. It is believed that the well is an outlet for a subterranean sea of oil, gas and salt water, and that it is in the Maxburg oil and coal fields. Thousands of people visited it and are afraid to make an investigation. The oil, when separated from the gas and water, is of first class quality. The roar of escaping gas and the underground grumbling can be heard for miles around."

Mars Approaching the Earth.

The month of August next is expected to bring important, if not wonderful and sensational, developments in the study of our mysterious heavenly little kinswoman. Aug. 5 next Mars will arrive at a point directly opposite this earth, which it reaches but once in fifteen years, when the distance between the two planets will be reduced from 141,000,000 to 35,000,000 miles. Upon that night a thousand telescopes will be leveled at the planet, which will repose in refulgent beauty in the southern skies, and a thousand eyes will seek to pierce the veil of distance that conceals the knowledge for which science thirsts.

Wonderful results are expected by reason of the marvelous improvements that have been made in astronomical instruments within fifteen years and since the last most favorable observation was made. With the powerful lenses and the photographic appliances of today it will be as if the far away visitor, tempted by curiosity, had drawn nearer to the earth than ever. Although Mars will be 35,000,000 miles away, the powerful Lick telescope will magnify her to a size as if viewed at a distance of but 17,500 miles.—Washington Star.

Count Herbert Bismarck and the Italian.

I met at a recent entertainment a gentleman who had just arrived from Italy, and who had gone much into Italian society during a prolonged stay in Rome. He told me that Count Herbert von Bismarck, when he lately visited that city, contrived to make himself very unpopular by his arrogant and aggressive manners. On one occasion he pushed so rudely against an Italian officer of high rank that the personage thus assailed gave vent to his indignation in very forcible terms. Without a word of apology the insolent Prussian retorted angrily:

"I am Count Herbert von Bismarck!"

"That, sir, is an explanation of your conduct, but it is no excuse," was the response.—Paris Cor. Philadelphia Telegraph.

The Soda Water Season Open.

Soda water fountains are blossoming out all over the east side for the summer season. There seems to be more soda water drank there than anywhere else in the city. Prices are one, two and three cents a glass. The highest price is for a new flavor which seems to be fashionable on the east side, though it has not yet apparently become known elsewhere. It is spelled in different ways, but the usual spelling seems to be Aramatariene rose. This is the costliest flavor that there is. Another popular flavor, which sells for only two cents, is rosberry, according to the soda water spelling.—New York Sun.

A Seventy-Five Foot Dive.

At Arctic Springs Floyd Williams, a twelve-year-old boy, climbed a tower seventy-five feet high and, reaching the last turret, dived off into the river. The descent was made in safety, and the boy after coming to the surface swam around for several minutes. It is regarded as a marvellous act. The tower was built expressly for Professor Leuvenmark, the famous diver, who gave an exhibition on Sunday by diving from the top, and who was said to be considered the only man in the United States able to dive safely from such a distance.—Cor. A GIGANTIC HOLE.

Scientists Puzzled by a Break in the Earth's Crust.

A MILE WIDE AND 600 FEET DEEP.

A Geologist Advances a Theory That an Explosion in the Ice Age Burst Through the Surface.

To the sheep herders, the hunters, the Indians and the frontiersmen the Koon Butte or Great Hole, as they sometimes call it, is simply a strange hole in the crust of the earth. Some sheep herders tending their flocks on the arid plains of southeastern Arizona picked up here and there little bits of iron ore. It was almost pure iron, nuggetlike in shape, and the sheep herders became enthusiastic, because they believed they had discovered in that desolate country an iron mine. So, in some excitement, they went to Albuquerque, which is the largest town in the vicinity, and going to some of the officers of the railroad they held out in their hands some of these nuggets of iron and said: "See, isn't this iron? If it is, we know where there is a mine of it not very far from here, and we are willing to sell or make arrangements with you for securing it, if you find that we are right."

There happened to be in Albuquerque at that time two mining experts, Dr. Foote, of Philadelphia, and Mr. Barry, and they pronounced the specimens magnetic iron of the finest quality, with every indication that it was of meteoric origin. They were therefore instructed to go to the place indicated by these men and make a thorough exploration.

While the experts did not find any iron mine, they did see something which most greatly interested them, and that was Koon Butte or Great Hole. They spent some little time in examining it, and were satisfied that it was a natural curiosity worthy the attention of the ablest scientists.

Mr. G. K. Gilbert, a scientist of wide repute and great ability, who is connected with the geological survey, gave much thought to the reports, and it occurred to him that possibly the great hole in the earth's surface might have been caused by a gigantic meteor. The theory or suggestion came to him on account of a coincidence which is very rare, if not unprecedented. In the first place there was a meteoric iron in small fragments, and in the next place a gigantic craterlike excavation in the earth's surface, the two conditions existing side by side. If Mr. Gilbert's theory or idea was correct he believed it could be easily determined.

Mr. Gilbert determined to visit in company with scientific experts the great hole, to make experiments and investigations that he might ascertain if possible whether his idea was correct, and if not, what the cause of the immense curiosity of deformity, so to speak, was. He took delicate scientific instruments, among others compasses which would be sure to reveal the presence of meteoric iron even at considerable distance. When he reached the Koon Butte he made some measurements. He found that the crater or hole was three-fourths of a mile across, and the bottom of the hole was 600 feet below the rim or topmost part of the crust, and 400 feet below the plain or level of the earth's surface. Therefore, whatever caused this enormous disturbance of the earth's crust had forced or squeezed or blown out of the hole rock and earth sufficient to rim the circumference about 200 feet above the surface of the earth.

The first experiments were made with the compass. The compasses had been tested in the navy yard in Washington, so that it was well known how near a piece of magnetic iron would have to be to disturb the needle. The tests were exhaustive, and not the slightest deflection of the needle was observed. Mr. Gilbert then reasoned that if a piece of magnetic or meteoric iron big enough to make that enormous hole was beneath the surface it must be at least fifty miles below the crust, or the needle would have given some indication of it. It of course was absurd to suppose that any object could have struck the earth with a velocity sufficient to penetrate the crust to a distance of fifty miles, and Mr. Gilbert therefore abandoned the idea of meteoric origin of this hole and began investigations looking to other explanations.

He considered many theories, all of which, on investigation, with one exception, proved to be unsatisfactory. He measured carefully the amount of earth and rock which composed the rim of the hole or crater, and then also measured the space bounded by the hole itself. And he found that if the earth and rock which composed the rim were shoveled back into the hole it would almost exactly fill it. That indicated to a certainty that no foreign substance was beneath the bottom of the hole, for if there was the material of which the rim was composed would more than fill the hole. This also showed that the earth and rock had been forced out by some violent subterranean force.

After making some very careful and delicate experiments Mr. Gilbert reached this conclusion: He decided that far beneath the surface of the earth at this point, perhaps a thousand feet, was a body of water resting upon primitive rock. The water from some cause became greatly heated in a prehistoric age. The amount of heat must have been enormous, for at that depth and under that pressure water does not change to steam until a far higher degree of heat is reached than 212 degs., which is the temperature that converts water to steam on the surface. Whatever the degree of heat, it was sufficient to convert the body of water into steam of enormous extensive power.

The force was sufficient at last to cause an explosion, to speak without technical accuracy, or, in other words, the power of the steam was so great that the earth's crust, even 1,000 feet in thickness, was not able to resist it. The pressure blew that hole in the earth's surface, carrying with it earth and rock, and the force of this explosion was so directed that it made a veritable hole almost exactly circular. Exactly the same thing happened that occurs when a steam boiler is bursted by the power of steam.

Having satisfied himself as to the cause, Mr. Gilbert undertook to decide if possible on the time when the remarkable and probably unequaled explosion occurred. His investigation led him to believe that it occurred probably during the ice age, when the whole northern part of the North American continent was covered with glaciers.—New York Sun.

An Interesting Sight.

A most interesting sight to see is that of a young lady with "lips like rubies" and with teeth of "pearly whiteness," and with cheeks that have stolen the "deep carnation of the deathless rose," with her mouth full of hot potato.—London Tit-Bits.

NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

A Mountain Band of Indians Who Still Use Bows and Arrows.

One of the most interesting places in North Carolina and yet one of the least known, even by the people of the old North State, is the reservation of what is termed the "eastern band" of the Cherokee Nation. The history of the reservation is a strange one. When the Indians in North Carolina were removed by the government to the Indian Territory, by far the greater part of the Cherokees left their old home forever. But a strong band retained land in three of the western counties in what was then almost a wilderness. A great tract of land was set apart as a reservation by the state, and voluminous laws governing these Cherokee lands were enacted.

Originally the tract of land held by the Cherokees was far larger than at present. It now comprises 73,000 acres, and some of it is the very best land in western North Carolina. It is mainly in Swain and Jackson counties, right among the mountains, and the entire country east of the Mississippi does not contain a more picturesquely beautiful region or one better suited to Indian taste and requirements, with its cold, clear streams full of fish, its mountains well wooded and abounding in game and its comparative remoteness from the beaten track of white people.

The wolf is yet a rover in this section, and there is a county bounty for his scalp, not only in the counties above named, but in several others. The bear is more abundant than anywhere else save in the great swamps near the coast of the state. Deer are also abundant, and the pheasant, or partridge, is found, though long since gone from other parts of the state.

The eastern band of Cherokees are an interesting race of people. The Western North Carolina railway passes within 10 miles of their reservation, Bryson City being the nearest railway station. The chief Cherokee town is known in English as Yellow Hill. It is a rambling place through which rushes a bold mountain stream, the Ocona Lufty. The Indian houses are all alike in design. They are built of logs, well fitted, with a porch on one side. They are built to stand the cold, which is great there sometimes. So high is the altitude and so encircled by mountains is the reservation that there is no hot weather.

The Indians are mainly engaged in farming, but do not do an extensive business in this direction, though they raise plenty of food. The present number of the eastern band is about 1,600, and it is certain that they are increasing. The healthfulness of that region is remarkable, and many of the Cherokees reach a great age. The oldest inhabitant is "Big Witch," who asserts that his age is 115 years.

The Cherokees vote and are on the same footing as other citizens of the state. During the late war their chief was a strong believer in the Confederate states and a fine battalion or legion was raised. This was commanded by Colonel Thomas, who years later died in an insane asylum, and it did effective service, being known as the "Thomas legion."

Earnest efforts are being made to educate these Indians. Those educated are very intelligent, speak English well and are fond of white people and do them favors. Many of the Cherokees, however, do not speak English at all and are as wild in appearance as any Indians in the far west.

Hunting is, as of old, the favorite pursuit. The smaller kinds of game are not ignored. The rifle is the usual weapon, but the bow and arrow and the blowgun are used. Some are very expert with these primitive weapons. The blowguns are nine or ten feet long and are made of a kind of reed, with a bore or diameter of about half an inch.—Exchange.

A Flowery Green Eyed Monster.

Dawes was in the summer house with Hawes. Their beloved wives were behind a bush and were horrified to hear the following conversation:

Dawes—I think Mrs. Alpheus Hardy lovely. I'm quite gone on her.

Hawes—Are you? Well, Sarah Owen is more my style. I saw her at our flower show last year, and I fell in love with her at once. So well formed and showy and——

But the wives could contain themselves no longer. They sprang at their respective husbands; they abused them; they became hysterical, but it is difficult to say whether pleasure or mortification predominated when at last they allowed their husbands to explain that the harmless chrysanthemum was the innocent cause of each one's jealousy.—London Tit-Bits.

The Advantage of Waiting.

Her Father—But, my boy, surely you are too young to marry Aurelia. How old are you?

Her Suitor—One-and-twenty, sir.

Her Father—And she is twenty-seven—too great a disparity. Why not wait half a dozen years? Then you'll be twenty-seven, and she'll probably be just about the same age as you.—London Tit-Bits.

Too Cheap For Her.

Mrs. Newgold—Have you any of Shelley's poems?

Clerk—We have a very fine edition of "Prometheus Unbound."

Mrs. Newgold—But I want it bound and as expensive as possible.—Truth.

BOLD OLD RANGER

A Veteran Bear That had no Fear of Man or Gun.

THE TERROR OF ONE COMMUNITY.

Famous and Dreaded for His Brazen Depredations.—Known all over the State of Maine.

"The boldest, most impudent bears to be found anywhere are the bears of Maine," said a sportsman who has hunted all kinds of bears but polar bears. "The Maine bear doesn't care a snap for a man, and that is rather queer for the bears must know that there is a big bounty on their scalps. Bears know everything. When I say that the Maine bear don't care a snap for a man I don't mean that he is any more apt to tackle a man than any other bear is, but that he will go into a man's barnyard after a calf, or a sheep or a pig, into his orchard after apples, into his cornfield, or into his yard and knock over the beeskips for the honey although the man may be standing not three rods away with a gun at that. This brazen impudence on the part of the Maine bear is what makes him such a terror to the farmers in that state, and it more than anything else led to the putting of a price on his head. It has also led to the invention of many devices for destroying the bold marauder by the farmers themselves.

"The favorite one of these is the trap gun. This is simply an ordinary gun, charged heavily with buckshot, baited, and placed in a cornfield or other place where the bear is likely to pay a visit with foraging intent. The bait and gun are so arranged that the instant the bear touches the former the latter is discharged, and in nine cases out of ten the quantity of lead bruin receives in his head and face loads him down so effectually that when the farmer goes out in the morning he finds the bear dead, and the carcass is a more valuable crop to him than anything any two acres of his land could yield him, for the bounty, and the hide, and the meat ought to represent forty or fifty dollars in cold cash to the agriculturist.

"The country around Bangor, say within twenty or thirty miles, is the most prolific bear region I ever struck. The bears seem to rise up out of the ground and look at you as you pass by without a protest. The last time I was over there the people in the vicinity of Maxfield were all broke up over the wickedness of a tough and cunning old bear, whose exploits had won him the name of Old Ranger. He was a great orchard thief, and had escaped from no end of traps, and it was estimated at that time that if he should drop dead just then and his weight was taken, not less than ten pounds of his avoirdupois would be represented by lead that had been shot into him any time within the five years then past.

"The whole of Penobscot county knew that bear, but he defied the entire populace until a farmer named Sawyer got so mad one day over some especially aggravating depredations the old bear had committed on his premises that he took his big moose gun and swore that he would go out and lay Old Ranger low before he came home again or die in the attempt. But Sawyer, after following the bear three days, modified his oath a little and came home the third night to see his family. Some time during the night he was awakened by a noise, and he recognized in it the voice, or rather lungs, of Old Ranger blowing in the orchard.

"With great caution Farmer Sawyer awoke his farm hands and stole to some of his neighbors and got together a small army of men. Armed with guns, axes, pitchforks and other weapons, and carrying a dozen lanterns, the hostile forces surrounded Old Ranger in the orchard, and for the first time in his life the tough and wily bear found himself in a corner. There was only one outlet to the woods from the orchard, and that was guarded by eight men with guns, including Sawyer with his moose gun.

"The display of lanterns had evidently dazed Old Ranger, for there was no reason why he couldn't have got out of the orchard and away into the woods before he was surrounded. But he didn't, and when he at last discovered the danger he was in and made a break for the path, he had to run a desperate gantlet. He received a shot from each one of the eight guns, including Sawyer's moose gun, but he ran the gantlet and kept right on for the woods. In spite of his wounds the tenacious old brute led the host of armed farmers a lively chase of nearly three miles into the woods before they came up with him. Farmer Sawyer was in the lead of the forces and was suddenly brought up all standing by a roar and a snort and a frightful snapping of teeth not far ahead of him.

"Lanterns were held up, and there, not twenty feet ahead, stood Old Ranger, his back against a rock and showing a defiant and terrible front. By the light of the lanterns Farmer Sawyer gave the bear both barrels of his moose gun, and Old Ranger's race was run. The big bear was lashed to two stout poles and the great carcass was borne into Maxfield by the triumphant hunters. When the people of the village heard that Old Ranger had been killed sleep was given over for the night, and daylight found the populace still rejoicing over the downfall of the dreaded marauder. Old Ranger weighed 460 pounds."—New York Sun.

A Common Effect.

"Do you think," said Willie Wishington, "that it actually hurts a man to be hit with one of Cupid's arrows?"

"No," replied Belle Pepperton. "As a rule he merely becomes senseless for a time."—Washington Star.

His Course.

"Now," said the medical professor, "if a man were brought to you, Mr. Hawkins, suffering from an unmistakable case of smallpox, what would you do?"

"I'd light out," said Hawkins.—Harper's Bazar.

TWO MEETINGS WITH A BEGGAR.

One Was Surprising, and the Other More Surprising Still.

One of the most peculiar beggars in the city may be found almost any evening parading up and down the Bowery, with occasional wanderings on the side streets. He is a very tall, gaunt man with deep set eyes, sharp features, a very gruff voice and a manner which, to put it mildly, may be called abrupt. Unlike the ordinary beggar, he does not accost every man who comes along, but picks his men according to some process of selection, which is probably a trade secret. For 15 or 20 minutes he will saunter along speaking to no one, then suddenly he will dart up to a stranger, thrust his face down close to the man and say something in a low tone. The peculiar part of it is that he rarely fails to get money.

A Sun reporter who had noticed this peculiar mendicant a dozen times, but had never been approached by him before, met him on the Bowery a few nights ago. The beggar was walking along with a contemplative air. When his eye fell on the reporter, his air suddenly became businesslike, and rushing up to the reporter he said sharply:

"How're y' fixed fer cash, young feller?"

"Fairly well," replied the reporter, taken off his guard. Then recovering himself he added, "I don't see that it's any of your business, however."

"Oh, well," said the man, with a nonchalant air, "I didn't know but what y' might wanter lend a feller a quarter."

"What do you want to do with the quarter?"

"Buy whisky. Do I look like a mug who'd try to buy champagne with a quarter?"

There was something so attractive and frank in the man, so much savoir faire about this tramp of the Bowery, that the reporter decided to "lend" him the desired quarter. Three nights later the reporter met his man on Grand street, and approaching him said, "When are you going to pay me back that loan?"

The beggar looked around in astonishment. Then a grim smile relaxed his features.

"You're the mug that giv' up a quarter on the Bowery, ain't you?" he observed. "I don't s'pose you'd ask it back unless you wanted it."

And to the intense amazement of the reporter the man, producing from a pocket of his ragged clothes a fist full of small change, selected two dimes and a nickel, put them in the reporter's hand and departed, whistling a cheerful ditty.—New York Sun.

Economy In Electricity.

A novelty in electric lighting is being practically tested in a large building in New York city. Instead of arranging the incandescent lamps on one circuit and feeding them continuously from the same source, they are arranged on a number of separate circuits, say four, and the current is alternately switched from one to the other in regular succession, the idea being that the current, having heated each successive circuit of lamps to incandescence, will be returned again to that series before the lamp filaments have time to cool. The means by which this is accomplished is the employment of a special interrupter or rotary cylinder, on which the segments are so arranged that a system of brushes, with which they make contact, carries the current alternately to each series of lamps. The periodicity of the current in this device is about 70 per second. Notwithstanding the loss of energy in the interrupting mechanism, the inventor claims that between two and three times as many lamps can be operated from a given source of energy by his system as by any other system now in use.—New York Letter.

An Editor's Awful Blunder.

The editor of a weekly journal lately lost two of his subscribers through accidentally departing from the beaten track in his answers to correspondents. Two of his subscribers wrote to ask him his remedy for their respective troubles. No. 1, a happy father of twins, wrote to inquire the best way to get them safely over their teething, and No. 2 wanted to know how to protect his orchards from the myriads of grasshoppers. The editor framed his answer upon the orthodox lines, but unfortunately transposed their two names, with the result that No. 1, who was blessed with the twins, read in reply to his query, "Cover them carefully with straw and set fire to them, and the little pests, after jumping about in the flames a few minutes, will speedily be settled," while No. 2, plagued with grasshoppers, was told to "Give a little castor oil and rub their gums gently with a bone."—Richmond Star.

Mammy's View of It.

An old colored woman, who came up from the south with her "white folks" to see the fair, was shown by her young "missus" the Intramural railroad and told that it was run by electricity. The colored "mammy" listened, and later in the day, when she met some of her own race, she surprised them by saying the fair was the wickedest place she was ever in. This was explained in the following remark, "Dey got in dar an immoral railroad, and it am done elected too."—Chicago Tribune.

TEDIOUS WORK.

The Author of "Mikado" Tells How he Produces Comic Libretto.

GILBERT'S LABORIOUS METHODS.

In Writing an Opera the Poet and Composer Must Work Hand in Hand.—Ideas for Plots.

I asked W. S. Gilbert what he considered the chief traits necessary to enable one to become a successful playwright.

"Well," he replied thoughtfully, "that opens up a very large subject. They differ vastly. In my own line I should sum them up as follows: In the first place, the power of catching the public taste; then a thorough knowledge of stagecraft and a gift for stage management, the capacity to invent a plot, the power to create characters, an eye for dramatic situation and scenic effect, and finally the faculty to write readily dialogue, lyrics and musical numbers."

"I believe, Mr. Gilbert," I said, "that you have little or no ear for music. Don't you find this interferes with your rhythmical numbers?"

"It is quite true that I have no ear for music, but I have a very sensitive ear for rhythm; it is precisely the difference between time and tune. I am very fond of music, but I don't know a discord when I hear one. On the other hand, the slightest error in time, which would probably escape a musician, would jar most gratingly on my ear. My fondness for music chiefly lies in hearing pieces which are connected in my mind with associations. I would rather hear an unknown soprano singing a song I knew than Patti singing one I did not know."

"Where do your plots come from, Mr. Gilbert?"

"Plots? Good gracious! where do they come from? I don't know. A chance remark in conversation, a little accidental incident, a trifling object, may suggest a train of thought which develops into a startling plot. Of course I am talking of original plots. I don't call adapting a play or translating a play writing one. Taking my own plots, for instance, the 'Mikado' was suggested by a Japanese sword which hangs in my study, 'The Yeomen of the Guard' by even a more unlikely incident. I had 20 minutes one day to wait at Uxbridge station for a train, and I saw the advertisement of the 'Tower Furnishing Company,' representing a number of beef eaters—why, goodness only knows. It gave me an idea, and I wrote the play originally as one of modern life in the Tower of London. Then it suddenly occurred to me to throw the time of it back to that of Queen Elizabeth. Having got one's plot, the next step is to fit in the characters. And the chief point in doing so is to invent original characters.

"I write out the play as a story, just as carefully as though it were to be published in that form. I then try to divide it into acts. I think two acts the right number for comic opera. At least my experience—and that is 30 years old—teaches me so. Sometimes, of course, the original story does not fall readily into two acts, and so requires modification. Well, I put it by for a fortnight or more, and then rewrite the whole thing without referring to the first copy. I find that I have omitted some good things that were in the first edition and have introduced some other good things that were not in it. I compare the two, put them both aside and write it out again. Sometimes I do this a dozen times; indeed the general public has no idea of the trouble it takes to produce a play that seems to run so smoothly and so naturally.

"One must work up to a good curtain. I believe very strongly in this, although I never take up any controversies, but simply go my own way on my own lines. The last impression is always the strongest, and the audience will often pardon a feeble, wearisome act for one dramatic climax at its conclusion. I can generally judge now what will have a good effect. Sometimes, but very rarely, it is spoiled by the interpreters. They always do their best, but occasionally they fail to realize my intention. The fact is that for comic opera many artists, especially tenors and sopranos, are necessarily engaged who are singers rather than actors, and it is not to be expected that carefully written comedy dialogue will receive full justice at their hands.

"Well, to go on with the writing of the play, I next sketch out quite roughly the dialogue and then fill in the musical numbers as I feel inclined. I do not attempt to write them in order, but just as the humor takes me—one here, one there, a sad one when I feel depressed, a bright one when I am in a happy mood. When at last all those of the first act are done, it is sent to the composer to be set to music, with a copy of the rough sketch of the dialogue to show him how the different songs hang together. I generally like reading it over to the composer, so as to give him my idea of the rhythm, which, as a matter of course, he varies at his pleasure.

"There must be perfect good fellowship between the writer and composer, as there is much give and take to be managed. Meters have to be changed by the writer, or tunes altered by the composer, to fit in with some idea, some intention, of the other partner. For instance, the writer may have put a theme in one meter, and the composer has a tune in his head which will just suit the theme, but will not fit the scansion, and so the lyrics must be altered. Each must try to make the other's part as easy as possible. There must be no jealousy, no bad feeling between the two. They must be on the best of terms, otherwise there will be no success."—Cor. St. James Gazette.

How Cinnamon Is Gathered.

Miss Cumming, in her book, "Two Happy Years in Ceylon," thus describes cinnamon cultivation and traffic, as she saw it in operation:

The cultivation is something like that of a willow copse, straight young shoots springing up around the stump of the plant previously cut. These shoots in their turn are cut every second year—that is to say, when they are about five feet high and two inches in circumference. A good many of these are sold as walking sticks, and find a ready market on board the steamers among the passengers, who think there must be a special charm in a cinnamon stick, though in truth it is hard to distinguish it from our common hazel.

But of course the real thing to be secured is the highly aromatic inner bark. First of all the leaves are stripped off, and then the bark is split from end to end with a sharp knife which has a curved point. With this, aided by the fingers, the bark is carefully removed in long pieces. These are heaped up and left to sodden, so as to facilitate the next process—that of scraping off the outer rind.

In order to do this each piece of the bark is placed on a round piece of wood and carefully scraped with the knife, the almost nude, brown workers sitting on the ground and using their toes as an extra hand to steady the end of the stick.

The bark is then left to dry in the sun, when it rolls itself up into tight quills. These are neatly sorted and packed, three or four inside of one another, and are made up into bales covered with cloth, and are then ready for export.

The Llano Estacado.

The great staked plain of Texas, known to Spaniards as the Llano Estacado, has long been held a geological curiosity, if not a mystery. Professor Hill has made a thorough reconnoissance and gathered data which gives the first intelligent scientific description of it. If the reader will conceive an island greatly elevated above the surrounding plains or "desert region" of the interior, bordered, with slight exception, on all sides by steep precipices resembling palisades, nearly surrounded by rivers at the base, embracing 50,000 square miles of surface, he will get a general idea of it.

It has no streams, a few ponds, no trees or bushes, and is unbroken by surface channels, yet it is well watered and densely carpeted with a rich growth of gramma grapes. Indeed, its nearly level surface is far more fertile than the level plains about it. Already stock has been introduced, and although margined by precipices of near 1,000 feet vertical height, it promises to become a great focus of cattle production.

The rainfall of the region is ample, all of which is absorbed, and none runs off. In many respects it differs from all other parts of Texas, having some resemblance to the so called Bad Lands of Dakota, and like these lands seems to be the bottom of an ancient lake, although its fossils are not stated. It is nearly as large as the state of Wisconsin.—Milwaukee Journal.

Where European Tourists Go.

Every summer out of New York alone go shoals of drummers, buyers and agents every year. Every big dry goods house sends men to scour the world for cloths and laces; tailors send buyers of men's clothing fabrics. Hundreds of men are paid to search the foreign markets for novelties in jewelry. Even the big dressmakers now spend hundreds of dollars in dispatching keen eyed, shrewd headed and quick witted representatives to watch foreign styles and buy foreign materials. And they are oftener women than men.

The Meccas of these commercial pilgrims are of course London and Paris. The favorite route of the pleasure seekers also includes those cities, but allows only a few days' stop in each. Generally speaking, it is laid out and divided as to time like this, although it is, as all things mundane are, infinitely varied by individual taste: On the ocean—outward bound, 8 days; in England, 10 days; in France, 10 days; in Italy, 20 days; in Switzerland, 14 days; in Germany, 10 days; in Austria, 4 days; in Belgium, 3 days; in England again, 3 days; on the ocean—homeward bound—8 days; a total of 90 days, or 3 months.—New York Press.

Australian Tea.

In the interior of Australia all the men drink tea. They drink it all day long and in quantities and at a strength that would seem to be poisonous. On Sunday morning the teamaker starts with a clean pot and a clean record. The pot is hung over the fire with a sufficiency of water in it for the day's brew, and when this has boiled he pours into it enough of the fragrant herb to produce a deep coffee colored liquid.

On Monday, without removing yesterday's tea leaves, he repeats the process. On Tuesday da capo and on Wednesday da capo, and so on through the week. Toward the close of it the great pot is filled with an acrid mash of tea leaves, out of which the liquor is squeezed by the pressure of a tin cup.

By this time the tea is of the color of rusty iron, incredibly bitter and disagreeable to the uneducated palate. The native calls it "real good old post and rails" (the simile being obviously drawn from a stiff and dangerous jump), and regards it as having been brought to the very pitch of perfection.—New Orleans Picayune.

Suicidal Marriage.

He was engaged to the girl, but he would not carry out the contract, though he refused to give her up.

She had coaxed him at first to give up his foolish notion, but he wouldn't have it, and finally she kicked out of the traces.

"Why don't you stop fooling," she said, "and marry me?"

"My dear," he pleaded, "marriage in my case would be suicide."

"Suicide? What do you mean?"

"I mean that I am so poor I could not hire a cook."

"Well," she urged bravely, "what of that? I am strong and well and can do the cooking until you are rich enough to hire a cook."

"I know that, my dear love," he murmured, taking her face in his hands, "it is your cooking that I am afraid of." And young love's dream was split wide open.—Detroit Free Press.

Forest Trees in Gardens.

According to Dr. Chapman, the practice of allowing forest trees to grow in our gardens "only prejudices the health of our families." The so called purifying power of vegetation is a fallacy. If carbonic acid gas is absorbed by trees in the daytime it is exhaled during the night. Dense foliage prevents a free current of air, excludes the sunlight, causes damp and so on, and maladies without number are the result. Dr. Chapman's warning seems hardly necessary, in our large cities at least.—London Tit-Bits.

We can think of no legislation that would give a greater impetus to a rehabilitation of the times in the United States than for congress to at once pass the Gorman or some other similar bill to prosecute to completion the work on the Nicaragua canal. That great work is a national and international necessity. It would give an ampulse to business, restore the energies of the nation, and bring into activity the dormant industries of the country. And even beyond this it would awaken confidence in the go ahead principle of our nation, and assure the people that no other country can possibly step in to the control of this natural oceanic highway between our Atlantic and Pacific territories. At the same time if it were made equally free to the flags of all nations we would be relieved from the necessity of subsidized competition in our ocean traffic. Let congress wake up.

The second trial of Heath for the murder of McWhirter ended in the jury disagreeing again. Heath is a lucky dog. Without any money of his own he has two trials that have cost somebody a small fortune The crime was, no doubt, a political murder, and those behind Heath know that if he is ever convicted he will expose the whole gang that was implicated in the murder, and they could not afford to have that occur. This state of affairs is caused mainly by the present jury system. If it only took a two thirds vote of a jury to convict, so many murderers would not now be going unhung. It would make it just that much more expensive to purchase enough jurymen to defeat the ends of justice.

The London "Standard", commenting on Samoa, says that "in common justice the Americans have no right to intervene in the affairs of a country so distant from their base." The "Standard" is evidently "off its base" or it would not make such a remark, which is particularly out of place in an English newspaper of all the journals in the world. If there ever was a country which was eternally meddling in the affairs of other nations, without even a pretense of any other right or justice than might gives, it is England. As for Samoa, it is much nearer the American than the English base, any way.

It would appear that the Brazilian rebellian is finally ended. It marks the complete collapse of the imperial cause in Brazil, for undoubtedly had Mello succeeded the restoration of the empire would have been proclaimed. That fact explains why Portugal is taking such a profound interest in the welfare of the insurgents. The royal family of Portugal and the imperial family of Brazil are both Braganzas, and consequently King Charles would like to keep all the thrones in the family that he can.

The foreign coal miners in Pennsylvania are being shipped to Texas to work in the cotton fields there. They are to replace the negroes. After they have caused three or four riots and terrorized whole neighborhoods, the Lone Star State will have a higher appreciation of the negro than it has ever had yet. By the way, will the Huns, and Slavs and Italians be allowed to vote?

Another man, Julius H. Marcus, is about to start from New York for a trip around the world without a penny in his pocket. Gotham is taking a quiet means of ridding herself of her impecunious citizens, but over 500 people in the same plight as Marcus left California for Washington ately, and we miss our guess if some of them don,t get into New York to take the place vacated by Julius.

The death of Senator Vance of North Carolina removes one of the most prominent members of the Democratic party in the Senate. The deaths and changes in the Senate are occurring with remarkable rapidity, Senator Vance being the third Senator who has died during the Fifty-third Congress.

The country is to be congratulated on the close of the Breckinridge case. Not since the Beecher trial has the community been treated to a social scandal of such mammoth proportions. The most satisfactory thing connected with it was the rebuke the Judge gave Colonel Thompson in his charge to the jury.

ONWARD.

Sometimes when the growing darkness,
At the close of day,
To the stress of daily labor
Brings a moment's stay,

All at once the mind will wander
Back to other years,
See as in a panorama,
Youthful hopes and fears.

Once again upon the threshold
Of our life we stand
And discern the future glowing
Like the promised land.

And the hopes of early manhood
Putting forth their leaf,
Green as are the leaves in springtime,
And their life as brief.

With a pang do we remember
That we meant to be
In the battlefield a hero,
Crowned with victory;

But, discredited and beaten
Have been forced to yield,
Or at best are barely able
Still to keep the field.

On our brow no crown of laurel
Tells of victory won;
Not for us the song of triumph,
When the day is done.

Other men have reaped the harvest
That we thought to reap;
Other men have gained the summit
Of the mountain steep.

And our hearts are bowed with sorrow,
Gazing on that scene,
For a moment as we picture
All that might have been.

For a moment! Then our manhood
Puts the sorrow by,
Crushes down again the heart throb,
Quells the rising sigh.

And once more we set our faces
Sternly toward the front,
Brace again our nerves and sinews
For the battle's brunt.

Onward! With success or failure
We have naught to do,
Ours to do our duty nobly
All life's journey through.

And, although success would cheer us
As we onward plod,
We can bear the doom of failure,
By the help of God.

—Good Words.

IN SOBER ROBES.

There she was, untidy as usual, lounging on the steps of West House, with her plump hands folded in her lap, her cap strings undone, her cape rakishly awry, her gray hair shamelessly rumpled. It was 7 o'clock, and the lowering sun had tinged the western sky with an edge of fadel brown. Frogs were calling, and a faint, intermittent tinkle of cowbells stole over the rolling pasture lands beyond the Shaker village.

Big and barren in the silvery half dusk the Shaker dwellings rose upon a background of pale skies and green fields. Everything looked stolid and blank. The meeting house, austerely plain, the sturdy houses, shops and barns, the very flower beds in the yard of West House, suggested an undeviating rigor of aim. And in the midst of it all, a very incarnation of cheerful laxity, sat Sister Huldah, with her pulpy, unascetic figure and broad, babyish old face.

Behind her a long vista of hallway ran straight and smooth through the center of West House. Now and then a woman in Shaker garb, plain and prim, went in staid steps across the painted floor to the sitting room at the farther end of the passage. It was the hour of the evening gathering, but old Huldah, squatting comfortably on the back door step, had forgotten about everything except the tranquil aspects of the twilight hours.

A man with longish silver hair under his flat hat came up the path.

"Good evening to you, sister," he said in a curiously soft, womanish voice. "You're not overlooking the hour of gathering, are you? Our new elderess is particular about having the family prompt." His accent was one of kindly warning, and Huldah started.

"Law, well!" she sighed. "I let it slip my mind, so I did! 'Tain't easy fer me to git into new ways of doin, Bro' Henry. We never heard of no gathering hour in Elderess Jane's time. I ain't passing a word agin Elderess Lucia. She aims to do right, but she's from up no'th, and she's young and upheaded, and—well, I reckon it's fer the best, but I ain't felt to home here since Jane died.

"She was a Kentucky woman, so she was, and she understood how 't a person might hev the love of Ann in 'em and yit disremember to tie their cap strings. No, Bro' Henry. I know 't the new elderess hes my good at heart. I know I'm keerless to my own ondoin, but I jest can't seem to git ahead of them cap strings! Look like I was born thrifless. I was always a-breaking things and tearing my clo'es and gittin into mud holes as a child, and being a Shaker fer 40 years ain't took it out'n my blood." She sighed deeply, but the expression on her mild face was one of genial resignation rather than hopeless grief

Brother Henry sighed too. The new elderess, though a holy woman engaged in laying great bases for eternity, had short shrift for human weaknesses.

"She has great gifts," mournfully conceded the old man. He went up the steps with the stiff accuracy of a pair of compasses and entered the house.

A tall, slight young woman was coming down the hall. Her very shadow on the yellow floor had a look of severity. She was young, with a pale beautiful face. The thin lines of her lips held something that was in harmony with the cold glance of her dark eyes, and she walked with a certain determined gait, as if each step were set to an exact measurement. She advanced to the door and looked out on the quiet garden, the fading sky, the rising stars and the slouching old figure on the steps. "Sister Huldah," she said.

Huldah's shoulders twitched. She lumbered hastily to her feet.

"I was jest laying off to come in," she advanced in a conciliating tone as she stood, broad and awkward, fumbling at her cap strings. "Look like I kind of lost myse'f a-setting here listening at the frawgs holler. Down in Lincoln county, where I was raised, the frawgs they used to start in of a night"——

"Huldah," remarked the elderess coldly, "there are cherry stains on your hands, and your skirt has a zigzag rent in the side breadth. Your hair is in a sad state. It is painful to me to keep speaking to you about your careless habits. You are very remiss. The youth of this house do not find you a good example. Nothing that you do is well done." She paused and then added, "I fear that it will be my duty, unless you mend your ways, to reprimand you publicly before the assembled family."

Huldah looked amiably remorseful. "I know I ain't worthy of my high callin as a follower of Ann," she said.

"No, Huldah, you are not," agreed the other, a little nettled at this easy contrition. "Ordinary reproof does not reach you. But if it is necessary I shall resort to other means." She regarded with level eyes the figure before her. "I shall send you away," she said. "I shall send you permanently to a northern community." There was no particular menace in Lucia's voice. She stood with her hands folded, looking far away toward the darkening horizon. "I shall feel it my duty," she resumed, and then very suddenly she stopped.

A look of vague horror had flashed into old Huldah's eyes. She stared blankly at the slight, stern figure in the doorway. "You'd might as well kill me," she panted, stretching out a shaking hand. "I'd as lief die as go out'n Kentucky. I was born and raised here. I run barefoot through its grass and waded in its creeks and climbed around its hills. I—I couldn't dror breath no other place. My folks is moljering onder Kentucky sod, and my own bones'd never lay still with any other sile atop of 'em. Oh, elderess! You—you ain't no human nature in you! You're hard as the flints in them hills yonder."

Lucia drew herself up. She was a little amazed at Huldah's heat of utterence, for in the elderess' three months of ministration in West House the old sister had never before exhibited anything like so much feeling. Lucia, after her first sense of surprise, was conscious of being rather pleased to have struck thus by chance upon a means of holding her thriftless sister in check.

"I have the welfare of the family at heart," she said. "Unless I see some change in you, Huldah, I shall send you next week to Ohio with Deacon Henry when he returns to his village."

Huldah gave a strange little laugh.

"Change!" she cried out. "Kin them critters as hes hoofs larn to fly? I'd quit being lazy and triflin if I knowed how. But I came of easy goin stock. I got shiftless blood in me, I reckon. But I rather die in Kentucky than live in Ohio." She lumbered heavily up the steps, and the young elderess watched her pass the house.

Lucia had a feeling of uncertainty. She had come to this village from a well ordered settlement in another region, and she cherished a praiseworthy design of lifting the Kentucky community to a level with more austerely conducted settlements. Her predecessor, Elderess Jane, had tempered justice with more mercy than Lucia believed well, and under her rule West House had worn a cheerful air of home and creature comforts.

There were red curtains in the sitting room windows and crochet tidies on the sitting room chairs. These worldly decorations Lucia at once removed as abominations conducive to low, fleshly ideals. She had a rigorous conception of the millenand idea, had Elderess Lucia, and the mild old Shakers of West House found themselves suddenly and violently elevated to a higher and sadder life.

"We will proceed with our doctrinal talk," said Lucia, entering the sitting room after her rebuke to Huldah. "Sister Huldah has gone to her room. We will excuse her tonight."

The next morning, however, she repented of this leniency, for when the family filed in to breakfast at 6 o'clock Huldah was not in line, and the elderess had a vision of her lying comfortably abed, forgetful of precepts and warnings. She prepared to be very stern with the irresponsible old soul, but when she went up stairs to pour incensed admonition upon Huldah's head, she discovered the surprising fact that Huldah was not in her little room. The place looked tidy with its high bed, scrap of a stove and dimity sash shade. But Huldah seemed to have gone, and when the elderess looked she found that Huldah's two print frocks and linsey petticoats and long Shaker bonnet were also gone.

Lucia had a sensation of unpleasantness. It did not sit well with her conscience to think that she had driven the old sister away. She sought to convey some assurance to Huldah, but no one seemed able to suggest, as to her whereabouts, anything more definite than that she had likely gone to "her kin down yender in Lincoln." Lucia accepted with a sense of self reproof the theory that Huldah had gone out into the world in a mood of resentment. Others had left the community in various moods of revolt against the new elderess' high handed methods. Commonly they came back properly subdued by the coldness of the world. No doubt Huldah would also return, and when she did so, Lucia determined upon treating her a little less sternly.

But though she fixed upon this considerate usage she found no chance for practicing it, for weeks passed on, and no word came of old Huldah. Summer roffed its green garments for coats of russet. In West House yard the cherry trees spread against the paling skies, and up the Shaker roads and around the stolid houses wintry winds swept cold and snow came early that year, folding in white the trim garden spaces. A cold winter set in. The preserving kitchens were shut and deserted, and the Shaker women, gathering of afternoons about their little heart shaped stoves, sewed carpet rags and wove mats and guilelessly stuffed emery bags with thistledown.

They sat at their tasks more quietly than had been their wont under the placid regime of Elderess Jane. Gossip was frowned on by the new elderess, who, by way of furnishing her household light entertainment, read to them while they worked from moldy records of the spiritual experiences of early followers of Ann Lee

One [illegible] while they sat and listened, a knock sounded at the sitting room door. A lank fellow, bundled in a wool scarf, stood on the threshold.

"Howdy," he said, amiably nodding at Lucia, who looked up with calm, dark eyes and smooth, soft lips which silently questioned the intruder.

"You're the new elderess, I reckon," premised the man. "I used to know Sister Jane right well. I'm the tollgate man. I was jest goin on to Harrodsburg, and I laid off to stop in and tell you some one's livin in the old log house down on the river. I knowed it was Shaker property, and I jedged you'd want to know. M' wife she see smoke comin from the chimney, and she hed me climb up the bank to see who was living there. I couldn't raise no one. But m' wife she says she see a woman sneak thoo the bushes up there with a passel of fagots. I didn't know but you'd want to hear if any one was livin in one of your houses and a-stealin your timber. Me and m' wife we're always glad to do the Shakers a good turn."

One of the Shaker women uttered an exclamation: "Law me! who ever hes to lie in that old crib must be poorly off! It ain't fit for firewood and half a mile from a livin critter! I wonder who—Why, law me! it couldn't be old Huldah?"

Lucia started. "She went to her people," she said sharply. And then, suddenly enough, she said to the tollgate man: "Will you take me to the place? Some one there may need help. Sister Rose, tell Abram to hitch up."

The spring wagon, however, could go only the less part of the way. At the turn to the ferry the tollgate man tied and blanketed the horse. Then he proceeded up a rocky break in the cliff side, and Lucia toiled after him through murmuring pines and between jagged stones, which nibbled hungrily through their slight covering of snow.

In the midst of leafless trees an old house presently disclosed a black and tumbling roof. At one side of the bleached log walls a massive chimney rose in a broken, hoary heap. Faintly from its mouth came a dying breath of smoke, but there was no other sign of occupancy, not even so much as a footprint in the slight snow about the door.

Lucia laid her knuckles against the rude panels. There was no response. The single window was boarded up, but as Lucia peered through a crack in the planks she caught a glimpse of a garment hanging across the panes—a garment of brown print at the pattern of which her heart twitched.

"Try the door," she said breathlessly. "Push it in!" There was a crack and a sharp cry as the tollgate man set his shoulder against the rotting panels. He caught himself by the jamb and stood peering in. It was nearly dark in the bare, puncheon floored room, except that now and then a tongue of flame thrust itself from a smoldering handful of twigs on the hearth. Against the farthest wall a woman crouched, a woman who at sight of Lucia struck out two bony hands and moaned and gazed blankly.

"Don't touch me," she said hoarsely. "I won't go! I won't! I've hid away here and prayed you'd never find me"——

"Huldah!" broke in the elderess passionately, "don't look at me so! I've come to take you home, Huldah—home to West House. Listen, Huldah! I've been hard and cruel, but I'll never pain you again."

The old woman seemed not to hear. She gazed round at the cracked walls, the pallet of brush, the darkened window.

"I ain't no trouble to no one," she muttered. "I've starved and froze and all. I've heard the owls hoot at night and ben skeered, and I ben lonesome and sick, but I was home, and I could 'a gone on if Ann would 'a' heard my prayers. But she ain't listened. She's turned agin me. She give me into your hand."

Lucia had cast herself on the rough floor and was clasping Huldah's knees.

"You are killing me, Huldah," she wept. "I have sinned against you and against all those whose lives I have made cold and hard. I meant to do right, but I was vain and wicked. Huldah! Huldah! do not forgive me. I do not ask it. I do not deserve it. Only come home with me and let me serve you as a daughter who has erred may serve the mother who pities her."

The tollgate man rubbed his nose with the end of his red scarf and wheeled away. Huldah stood gazing confusedly down on the kneeling slender figure, with its wringing hands and beautiful pale face and streaming eyes.

"Be you'ns a-cryin?" she stammered. "I 'lowed you was a flint. And kneeling to me! Elderess Lucia—don't ye, don't ye! Sit up, Elderess Lucia!"

But Lucia clasped her the closer.

"Not till you promise to come with me," she sobbed. "Not till you promise not to hate me as I deserve."

Huldah drew a quick breath. Her hand trembled down upon the young woman's black, soft hair.

"Hate you?" she breathed. "Why, I'll go—now—wherever you take me—or send me!"—Harper's Bazar.

Lived Off His Sister.

Not long ago a young man whose sole business, apparently, is to wear fine clothes and to enjoy life generally was a witness in a lawsuit at a town not many miles from Buffalo. When, in putting the preliminary questions, the attorney asked him what was his occupation, the witness was visibly embarrassed.

"Come, come, what is your business?" repeated the lawyer impatiently.

"I—I—er—I—er"— stammered the young man, blushing painfully; "I—er—that is, my sister is a dressmaker."—Buffalo Express.

An Erroneous Supposition.

During the Nez Perce war of 1877 two soldiers were pursued by savages and had to fly for their lives. One of the soldiers was better mounted than his companion and soon was several hundred yards in the lead. Looking back, he perceived that the enemy was getting dangerously near, so he shouted:

"Come on; they're right after us!"

The man in the rear ironically replied:

"You don't think I'm trying to throw this race, do you?"—Spokane Outburst.

He Was a Senator.

Senator Allen of Nebraska is a big, burly man who looks like a prosperous dealer in live stock. Shortly after his arrival in Washington he was stopped at the door of the senate chamber by a new doorkeeper, who informed him that no one save senators was allowed on the floor. Mr. Allen smiled sadly, waved his hand and said: "Very well, sonny. I'm a senator. I don't look it, I know, but I am, just the same," and passed into the sacred precincts.—Chicago Herald.

DESCRIBE YOUR FRIEND.

And Then See How Well Your Picture Will Fit Scores of Others.

"He was a young man and fairly good looking: smooth face and without glasses; wore a dark suit, was about 5 feet in height and looked like a married man. Anybody would know him." Such was the description turned in by a young woman who slipped quietly into the city editor's office and wanted to advertise for Chalmers. It appeared that Chalmers had left home, and nobody knew why, and this young woman had faith that her recital of his personal traits would bring him back. It was a good example of the average person's power of description of a fellow being.

It is totally inadequate! Though man be fearfully and wonderfully made, there seems to be an unaccountable inability in nine persons out of every ten to give a creditable word picture of any one whom they have seen. Because we understand the looks of a person when we meet them, it never occurs to the mind that other people do not grasp a thorough idea of his appearance with a few passing phrases of description.

Your friend comes in, and you expound to him that such and such a man has just called for him, but almost invariably your exposition is a jumbled lot of phrases which apply to the human race in general.

The other day when I rushed into my office room with a column story on the end of my tongue—or at the tip of my pen, to be more accurate—I was given this greeting:

"Hello! A man has just been in to see you."

"What did he look like?"

"Oh, he was a good looking fellow—not very tall, rather heavy, but not too much so."

"Was he old or young?"

"About 20 or 25, I should say."

"What color of hair?"

"I don't remember now. However, I don't think he had a mustache."

"How dressed?"

"Oh, just an ordinary business suit."

Have you ever heard such a description? If not, watch yourself next time you tell of some one's call. You will be surprised to find that your description would fit almost any member of the human race.

Why is it?

I don't know. We read in books that it's because we don't cultivate the habit of intelligent observation.

There was once a boy who learned how to describe what he saw. Every morning he was sent by his father to walk rapidly by an elegantly arranged window, and then afterward to repeat to him all the things he saw at this one glance at the panorama and to describe them. At first the lad could remember but few things that his eye may have caught in the passing glance, but in time he could remember almost everything in a show window by merely seeing it once.—Boston Herald.

At the Manicure's.

The manicure with the golden hair was bending over the hand of a new customer.

"Do you want your hands bleached?" she asked.

"Yes."

She applied the bleach, using more than the ordinary quantity upon the thumb and forefinger of the right hand. After working for about five minutes she stopped and said:

"It is always difficult to remove nicotine with the first application."

"Wh-a-at?" gasped the society girl, elevating her eyebrows. "Nicotine? What do you mean?"

"The cigarettes, you know," replied the manicure. "It's perfectly awful how they stain the fingers, ain't it?" And she smiled a smile that even the society girl couldn't resist. That made them friends, and they fell to discussing the different brands of cigarettes. And when the job was done the society girl whispered:

"What'll take the stain off?"

"Use lemon juice—I do—we all do.'

"Thanks."—New York Herald.

About Opals.

The prejudice against opals appears to be disappearing. Anyhow they are popular. There are several varieties of opals and therefore several degrees of merit. The precious, or noble, or oriental opal is the supreme. This has all the colors, and when these colors are broken into spangles it is then called the harlequin opal. Then comes the fire opal, or girasole, with hyacinth red and yellow reflection. The former comes from Hungary, the latter from Mexico. The common, or semiopals, are nonopalescent. The hydrophane, or oculus mundi, is nontransparent, but becomes so by immersion in water or any transparent fluid. The cachalong is nearly opaque and of a bluish white color. The hyalite is colorless, pellucid and white. The opal jasper or wood opal is the petrifaction of wood opalescent, but without the coloring which makes the "noble" gem so precious.—Chicago Tribune.

Working For a Holiday.

An Englishman stopping at one of the hotels was commenting upon the extreme restlessness and incessant go of Americans. He said, "You Americans have such a beastly idea of the compensation of work."

"What do you mean?" questioned a Pittsburger standing near by.

"Oh, you people work for money," was the explanation.

"I don't see anything beastly about that," was the retort. "May I ask for what you Englishmen work?"

"Why, we work for our holiday," was the reply.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Vienna.

Vienna is of nearly circular form, being 12 miles in circumference. The old city, or city proper, is, however, scarcely three miles round. It was formerly inclosed by fortifications. Immediately outside of these was a wide esplanade called the Glacis, which has been elegantly built up and is called Ringstrasse, one of the most splendid streets in the world.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Fortune For Mrs. Drayton.

Mrs. Coleman Drayton is once again domiciled in her former home on Fifth avenue. She has just engaged her servants for the winter, and is well equipped as to comfort in regard to housekeeping and ease in entertaining. For all this present and prospective luxury she has her brother, Mr. John Jacob Astor, to thank, he having settled the house on her for life, as well as given her $1,000,000 outright. Society commends Mr. Astor for making this very liberal gift to his sister.—New York World.

DIED.

SCOTT.—At Bishop, April 12th, Ada F. Scott eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Scott, aged 14 years.

Bar silver, 63½.

Jas. E. Parker went to Darwin to-day on a short visit.

Fred Hulbert returned from Los Angeles early in the week.

Miss Etta Naylor returned home from Alvord on Wednesday.

A bill for the admission of Utah as a state will soon pass the Senate.

Mrs. D. J. Hession and Miss Maud Cook are visiting friends at Big Pine.

Mrs. J. Wills arrived at Independence on Monday from Lamar, Missouri.

Mr. and Mrs Henry Bell of Big Pine visited Independence during the week.

Mrs. W. M. Richards of Keeler spent a couple of days in town this week visiting friends.

Mr. and Mrs. L. F. J. Wrickle started for San Francisco last Tuesday to visit the Big Fair.

Mrs. S. A. Williams of Big Pine visited Independence at the end of last week on business in the Superior Court.

A six-horse team belonging to O. I. Mairs arrived from Mojave yesterday with a load of supplies for the Norman House.

John Fiehman and family arrived home at Keeler on Wednesday's train after a visit of three weeks at the Midwinter Fair.

The ditch men have been in town to-day in full force. It is reported that the long looked for pay-day may become a reality.

Mr. and Mrs. F. K. Andrews and Wm. McDonald of Bishop were at Independence at the end of last week on land office business.

Wm. Arcularius had his big team thoroughly refitted in town this week and has gone to Darwin to haul ore from that point to Keeler.

Hon. P. Reddy arrived from San Francisco last Monday on his way to Darwin, where he is looking after his extensive mining interests.

The first band of sheep for the season got here last Saturday. Recent arrivals from Mojave say there are several more bands on the way.

Mrs. H. B. Boland, accompanied by her children, arrived at Keeler early in the week from a visit of several months with relatives at Philadelphia.

Judge Madden came in from Modock yesterday and expects to remain in town about a month on a vacation. He says no hilarity goes this time.

Chas. Anthony came up from Darwin on yesterday's train, returning to-day. He returned home a short time ago from a lengthy visit at San Francisco.

W. W. Watterson of Bishop was in town early in the week. Mr. Watterson has a band of about 2,500 sheep at Blackrock. He says that the foothill feed is unusually short this year owing to lack of rain.

For over a week past the weather has been stormy with a considerable fall of rain in the high Sierras. The storm has been general throughout the State, and it is hoped that the crops may yet be partially saved.

Two men sent out by the State Bureau of Minerology are now making an extensive examination of the mines in the southern part of the county. They have visited Darwin and Modock and are now at Panamint and the adjacent country.

Remember that taxes become finally delinquent next Monday, and if not paid then 5 per cent will be added, together with the cost of advertising. Sheriff Gorman says that taxes have been well paid up, and that the delinquent list will be short.

School Report.

The following scholars obtained an average of 80 per cent. and upwards in the examinations held during the half-term ending April 20, 1894.

Primary Grade—Maggie Bunney, 85; Rita Church, 89.7; Edw. Eibeshutz, 82.3; John Hession, 83.2; Jesse Hession, 91.7; Mamie Hession, 80.7; John Gorman, 85.7; Lena Levy, 89.7; Milton Levy, 80; Howard Mairs, 88.3; Hattie Moore, 81.3; Chas. Mulholland, 80; John Symmes, 84.8; Irma Webb, 80; Blanche Wood, 87.3.

The following scholars passed with an average of 75 per cent. and over: Birdie Levy, Clifford Baxter, Ivan Bunney, Amy Lawrence, Arthur Mairs, Paul Mairs, Eva Lawrence, Jesse Lawrence, Nettie Irwin, Bessie Parker.

Mining Notes.

The most encouraging reports are received from the mines in the Southern end of the County. The Sorba mine still continues to ship a large quantity of good ore. A large ore body has recently been opened up in the Defiance mine. Mr. Reddy has clung to this mine with all his well known pertinacity and he is to congratulated upon his success. The Modock mine is looking well, as is also the Minnietta. Messrs. Fitzgerald and Gunn are making regular shipments from both properties. Tim Madden says that a few good miners can get work there. Chas. Anthony has sent a load of supplies to Snow's Canyon for J. J. Morton. The Wilsons, father and two sons, are reported to have a good mine in the Slate Range near Willow Springs. They have purchased a stamp mill from Mr. Reddy and will soon have it in operation. The mining outlook is now quite bright.

Artesian Water.

J. A. Shelhamer of Pasadena, accompanied by a party interested with him in the enterprise, arrived at Olancha last week. They have located a large tract of fine land south of Olancha and will bore for artesian water. Should they meet with success in the undertaking, and there is every reason to believe they will, a most valuable property will be acquired and others will be induced to venture upon similar experiments. Irrigation by means of artesian water is the most satisfactory known. There is no no question of title, the supply is always the same and can easily be regulated. A number of desultory attempts have been made to bore for artesian water in this Valley, but none of them were ever pushed to any depth. The deepest interest will be manifested in the experiment of Mr. Shelhamer.

A Useful Work.

Some time ago G. P. Rixford of San Francisco was appointed to look after the Inyo county exhibit at the Mid-Winter Fair. Mr. Rixford has placed the exhibit in a most creditable condition. He has had printed several thousand folders for distribution. They contain in a concise form a description of the county and its products. Just as rapidly as exhibits are received Mr. Rixford has them placed in position. There can be no doubt but that this exhibit will be of great benefit to the county. The large map of itself attracts much attention, and is a good object lesson of the large amount of irrigable land now ready for cultivation in Owens Valley. The efforts of Mr. Rixford should meet with the highest commendation.

The Soda Springs Mines.

So far eleven gold bearing mines have been discovered in Soda Springs district, Esmeralda County on the line of the Carson and Colorado railroad fifty miles south of Hawthorne. One ledge five feet wide has been uncovered that shows plenty of $200 rock. Another four feet wide shows up a big body of $40 ore, and still another five foot ledge that assays $70 per ton. What is termed as the "waste rock" assays $20 per ton. The district as a whole will average anywhere from $20 to $70 per ton. The district is attracting much attention, and the Reno Gazette says the camp is likely to contain 3,000 or 4,000 people before Fall.

Captain Henry G. Martin, special agent of the General Land Office arrived at Independence yesterday. Mr. Martin intends investigating the survey of the State line and will leave Big Pine with a party of six men for that purpose. He will endeavor to ascertain the amount of work done by Benson in that region.

J. J. Morton came over from Madera last week and spent several days in town. He intends putting a force of men at work immediately on his mine at Snow's Canyon and erecting a 5-stamp mill there. Mr. Morton will remain at the mine for several months and personally superintend the work.

Wm. Rowan came up from Los Angeles this week bringing with him over a hundred head of horses from Ventura county. There is no feed in that country and the horses must be driven out or starve. An unusually dry season like the present one is what produces a lively appreciation of the value of irrigation.

Chas. Summers and Chas. Williams came down from Bishop on Wednesday, returning yesterday. They say there is no more show now in the Long Valley country than is usually there at July 1st.

H. P. Cartier arrived home from San San Francisco last Monday. While there he saw a number of old-time Inyoites who made many kind inquiries for former friends here.

Last Monday a sale took place at Lone Pine of the property left there by the Government party that explored Death Valley some time ago. The proceeds amounted to $83.

A report reached Bridgeport last week that Andy Allen died recently in Modoc county. Andy was well known here, having attended several of our district Fairs.

P. H. Mack and O. I. Mairs arrived home from Los Angeles Wednesday night. Mr. Mairs succeeded in disposing of his beef cattle at good prices.

To The Public.
